Chapter One

Arrival of Europeans in India: Establishment of British rule

Introduction:

This subcontinent is the cradle of one of the oldest civilizations in the world. Its endless wealth and opulence have attracted foreigners for ages. Therefore, since ancient times, various nations have come to this subcontinent in the hope of extracting wealth. Some came as invaders, others as merchants.Since ancient times, India has been isolated from the rest of the world by land, sea and the northern Himalayas. Indian society and civilization developed in their own characteristics due to lack of opportunity to exchange ideas with other countries. Innumerable rivers flowing from the Himalayas have given the land of India sujala-sufala-shyamala. India can be called the gift of the Himalayas just as Egypt is called the 'Gift of the Nilans'. Being a riverine country, India was rich in various types of crop production and forest resources. It is well known as the world's largest problem producing country. This country is also full of mineral resources. Hence India's natural resources and opulence have attracted foreigners throughout the ages.

India is full of diversity. In comparison to other countries of the world, it is reasonable to name this country as Indian subcontinent due to its large size, large population, numerous castes, religious and linguistic diversity and natural diversity. Excluding Russia, it is almost equal to the entire European continent in terms of area and size. The population of this subcontinent is about one-sixth of the world's population. There is no account of how many races, religions and languages have risen and fallen in this country. At present there are about two hundred languages and five hundred dialects in the subcontinent.

Finally, a combination of Hindi and Persian gave birth to Urdu during Muslim rule, which is known as the spoken language of most Indian Muslims.Hindus are also divided into different classes as caste system is prevalent in this country; For example, Brahmins, Kshatriyas, Vaishyas and Shudras. Marriage was prohibited among them. Shubhra was the most neglected and untouchable in the society. They had no social right to go to markets, fields, and ghats. In the history of ancient India, there is no description of any continuous historiography. About this, the famous Muslim traveler Al Beruni said, Hindus did not pay much attention to historical events. They were very indifferent to the succession of accounts of the accession of their kings. When they were asked for all these details, they would get confused and tell other stories.

A Greek envoy named Megasthenes of Seleucus, the commander of the Greek hero Alexander, was sent to the court of the Maurya emperor Chandragupta. He left valuable historical details about the Maurya regime and India in his famous book 'Indica'. Moreover, much historical information is available in the descriptions of Greek and Roman writers such as Quintus, Cuttius Diodorus, Arrian Strauss, Plutarch Hollinshed etc. "The library was rich in historical information. From these books, the western countries could learn about India's natural resources and abundance. Therefore, Europeans like other nations came to this country for the purpose of business after learning about the immense wealth and wealth of the subcontinent. Over time, their merchant standards took advantage of the weakness of the local nobility. became the scepter and they became the fortune tellers of this country.

European companies coming to India: Since ancient times, there has been good commercial relations with the western countries in the subcontinent. Since the Crusades, the trade relations of Western countries with the Indian subcontinent became closer. At that time, the city-states of Italy like Venice, Florence, Genoa etc. established trade centers in the cities of Asia Minor and gained exclusive commercial rights in the Mediterranean region. But in 1453 AD, when Turkey occupied Constantinople (Istanbul, Turkey) and dominated the Mediterranean region, the monopoly of Arab merchants was established in the field of trade, as a result, the trade routes of the subcontinent with the Western countries were blocked. At one time, Arab merchants played a leading role in commercial affairs. But as it was blocked, European merchants looked for alternative routes to establish contact with India. As the demand for Indian goods especially spices, gold and silver was felt high in all the European countries, they were eager to find new routes with the Indian subcontinent to establish direct commercial contact. As a result of their efforts, two colonial expeditions took place at that time, one of which was the discovery of America by Columbus in 1492 AD and the other one was the discovery of the waterway from Europe to India by the Portuguese sailor Vasco-da-Gama (1498 AD).

Vasco da Gama's first voyage

Discovery of new routes by Vasco-da-Gama: The geographical discovery of the European continent in the fifteenth century and the rise of the Portuguese power inspired them to adventure geographical discoveries. Among the European nations, the Portuguese were the most adventurous and skilled at seamanship. The Portuguese, led by the Portuguese navigator Prince Henry, continued to search for a route to the subcontinent through South Africa, and in 1487 AD, navigator Bartholomew Diaz Uttamasha visited Antrip. On the route shown by him, the King of Portugal sent an expedition under Vasco-da-Gama, and after a long and adventurous voyage, on May 20, 1498 A.D.

He arrived at the port of Calicut in the subcontinent. With Vasco da Gama's arrival in the subcontinent, direct contact with Europe was established.

Vasco da Gama

Portuguese Company: Vasco da Gama's arrival in the subcontinent in 1498 AD is an important event in terms of geographical discovery. When he landed at the port of Calicut, the local king Zamorin offered him hospitality. The Arab merchants became jealous and opposed the Portuguese. As a result, Vasco da Gama was forced to leave the subcontinent after a three-month stay. But before leaving the subcontinent, the military weakness of the Indian nobility and Arab merchants became apparent to him.

After Vasco da Gama's homecoming, Pedro al-Varez Cabral arrived in the subcontinent with a fleet of thirteen in 1500 AD. The Raja Zamorin of Calicut extended him proper hospitality. But he became alarmed by the continued repression of Arab traders and declared war on the Portuguese with the help of local Muslims, the Sultans of Gujarat and Egypt. But the combined forces of the King of Calicut were miserably defeated by the Portuguese as the Portuguese merchant ships were well armed with cannons like modern warships. As a result of this defeat, the political weakness of the Indian royalty became evident in the face of the Portuguese. As a result they started interfering in Indian politics. After Cabral left the subcontinent, Vasco da Gama again came to the Indian subcontinent in 1502 AD and established two trading posts at Cochin and Canonore. The Portuguese then introduced the policy of sending one representative a year to inspect the Indian trading posts. Almida arrived in India as the first Portuguese ruler with a naval force. His main aim was to establish Portuguese supremacy by dominating the sea and expanding trade and commerce. Then the arrival of Francisco de Albuquerque in 1505 AD.Albuquerque arrived in the subcontinent in 1509 AD after the return of Francisco de Almeida as a representative of the Indian trading posts. Albuquerque was the greatest of Portuguese governors and under his leadership the Portuguese became very prosperous and powerful in the subcontinent. Albuquerque took advantage of the weakness of the princely classes of the Indian subcontinent to establish a Portuguese empire in the subcontinent. This imperialist policy of his is called Niljalniti. For this purpose, he captured Goa from the Sultan of Bijapur in 1500 AD and built it as a strong trading base. He then conquered Malacca (present day Malaysia) and Hormuz and established a powerful trading center at Cochin. Despite the oppression and persecution of the Portuguese against the Indian people, he ordered the marriage of Indian women to build a permanent Portuguese society in India. He worked selflessly to protect the interests of the Portuguese and he died in 1515 AD. His successors were able to establish powerful trading centers in Diu, Calicut, Cochin, Bombay, Sinhalese, Hooghly and Bangladesh. But their dominance in the subcontinent did not last long. Gradually the rise of the English and the Dutch led to their downfall.

The fall of the Portuguese

The Portuguese were the first European traders to arrive in the subcontinent. Established strong forts and trading centers in different regions of the subcontinent. But their mistreatment and oppression of the Indians gradually led to the downfall of the Portuguese.

Firstly, religious intolerance and inhumane oppression of the people of the conquered territories was one of the reasons for the downfall of the Portuguese. The audacity of forcibly abducting Hindu-Muslim boys and girls and converting them to Christianity or turning them into slaves, abducting two of Empress Mumtaz Mahal's maids infuriated the Emperor. As an immediate result, the emperor expelled these unwanted foreigners from Hooghly under the leadership of Qasim Khan in 1632 AD.

Secondly, the Portuguese government could not send any competent governor to the subcontinent after Albuquerque.

Thirdly, Portuguese rule in the occupied territories of the subcontinent was corrupt and corrupt. They used to collect extra taxes and usurpation from the people as they did not get regular salaries. Their cruel behavior and insolent behavior was against the Portuguese rule in the country.

Fourth, in 1580 AD Spain and Portugal under the leadership of Phillips II united and fought against the Dutch and the English. As Spain and Portugal suffered a lot in this war, it was not possible to maintain their kingdom in distant India.

Fifthly, the Portuguese companies lost their discipline due to the lack of financial support from the homeland. They secretly engage in various illegal trades. But under the strict control of the Mughal Emperor Akbar, the progress of the Portuguese was hampered.

Sixth, three other European merchant communities emerged during this period. They are - Dutch, French and English. As they engaged in commercial competition, conflict between them was inevitable. Indulging in a test of strength, the Portuguese lost all trading posts in the subcontinent except Goa and Diu. Not being able to maintain the balance of power, the English and French powers became dominant in the Indian subcontinent by removing the Portuguese.

Arrival of the Dutch in the Subcontinent:

The inhabitants of Holland are known as Dutch. After the Portuguese, they came to the subcontinent for trade. For the purpose of trading in the East, they established many small trading establishments. But when the English East India Company was formed in 1600 AD, the small trading companies of Holland collectively formed a joint company called United East India (1602 AD). Dutch merchants gradually moved towards the islands of Southeast Asia for trade purposes and captured Malacca from the Portuguese in 1641 AD. Meanwhile, Jan-Petersen Koen took over the Dutch company and tried to expand the business towards the Indian subcontinent. He besieged Goa in 1658 AD and expelled the Portuguese and occupied Sinhala.

The Dutch gradually moved towards the subcontinent by establishing their authority in islands like Sumatra, Java etc. Gradually Dutch trading posts were established in Gujarat, Coromandel, Bengal, Bihar and Orissa. Their strong trading centers in the subcontinent were Surat, Chunchura, Patna, Kasim Bazar, Cochin and Nagpatam. When the Portuguese lost their trading posts in the Indian subcontinent to the Dutch, their conflict with the British became inevitable. In the end, the Dutch could not maintain the balance of power with the British in the Indian subcontinent and left India in 1805 AD and returned to their homeland.

Arrival of the Danes:

Like other European nations, the Danes arrived in the subcontinent in 1616 AD to form the Danish East India Company. Danes were natives of Denmark. They established two trading posts at Tribankur in Tanjore district in 1620 AD and at Srirampur north of Calcutta in 1676 AD. Not being able to survive with other nations in trade competition, the Danes returned to their homeland after selling their trade to the British in 1845.

Arrival of the British in the subcontinent:

The arrival of the English in the subcontinent was an important event like that of other European nations for the purpose of trade. The successful voyages of other European merchant communities, the success of foreign trade, Francis Drake's circumnavigation of the globe in 1580 AD, the defeat of the Spanish Armada by the English fleet, descriptions of the immense wealth of the subcontinent by Ralph Fitch and Sindenhallow greatly encouraged English merchants to trade in the East. They formed a merchant community in London on September 23, 1600. 217 English merchants. He requested a charter from Queen Elizabeth I of England for the purpose of trade in the East. It obtained exclusive permission to trade on behalf of England in India and the entire East Indies. The newly formed commercial organization was known as the English East India Company.

Consisting of a governor, an assistant governor and twenty-four members, the company was granted by the queen the right to trade in the East for a period of fifteen years. The certificate was issued on 30th December 1600 AD. The capital of the East India Company at the time of formation was 68 thousand pounds. The term of the company was fifteen years but it was renewable.

Establishment of British trading posts in the subcontinent: The East India Company had to face various difficulties in the beginning. Because long before the arrival of the English merchants, the Portuguese and the Dutch had occupied the trading bases of the East. That is why they had to face multiple oppositions and fierce competition with Portuguese and Dutch merchants. Early trading ships of the English company were sent to Java, Sumatra, Malacca and Javadwipa. But after being chased away by the Dutch merchants, the English took the initiative to build a trading post in India in 1608 AD. At this time, Captain Hawkins arrived at the court of the Mughal Emperor Jahangir of the Indian subcontinent with the permission of King James I of England. On the application of Hawkins, the British got permission from Emperor Jahangir to build a trading post in Surat. But all the privileges granted to the English by the Emperor were rejected due to the opposition of the Indian merchant community of Surat and the Portuguese. As a result, the English East India Company had to face great difficulties due to the opposition of the Dutch in the Malay Islands and the non-cooperation of the Indian Portuguese.

In 1612 AD, two merchant ships of the East India Company attempted to enter the port of Surat and were intercepted by the Portuguese fleet. But Captain Best of the English company soon destroyed the Portuguese fleet and took a position at Surat. As a result, the prestige and status of the English increased with the Mughals. The Mughal Emperor Jahangir was pleased with Captain Best's success and in 1613 AD he granted permission to the English to build a trading post in Surat. In 1615 AD, the English defeated and expelled the Portuguese in another naval battle and occupied Hormuz.

In 1615, during the reign of King James, Sir Thomas Roe came to the court of Emperor Jahangir as an ambassador. He stayed at the Mughal court for three long years and obtained many commercial opportunities for the East India Company. As a result, the British were able to establish trading posts at places like Surat, Agra, Ahmedabad and Broach. The trade management of these territories was entrusted to an English Resident and a Council. As a result, the Portuguese power in the East Sea was greatly weakened. Then Sir Thomas Roe returned home in 1619 AD.

In 1661, King Charles II of England married the Portuguese princess Catherine of Braganza and received the city of Bombay (now Mumbai) as dowry. After some time he sold it to the East India Company for fifty thousand pounds a year. As a result Bombay (Mumbai) became the strong trading base of the British instead of Surat in western India.

In 1611 AD, the English built a trading post at Masulipatnam in the Golconda state on the southeast coast of the subcontinent. But as a result of the continued opposition of local merchants and the Dutch, the British established another trading post at Aramgao in 1626 AD and obtained commercial rights to Mosalipattam and other ports from Golconda Sultan on the promise of paying annual taxes. Meanwhile, an English sailor named Francis Day obtained the lease of Madras from the king of Chandragiri and built a fort named St. George there. Thus Madras became a powerful trading center of the British. Gradually, the British established trading posts in Hariharpur, Balasore, Patna and Kashim markets in Orissa.

As the East India Company could not benefit as expected in trade and commerce in the subcontinent, their policies gradually changed. Towards the end of the seventeenth century, English merchants abandoned the policy of peace and adopted the policy of war. As a result, their commercial standards become skeptical. There were various reasons behind this. Firstly the Mughal-Maratha conflict in the Deccan. The looting of the port of Surat by the Marathas and the decline of Mughal rule in Bangladesh encouraged the British to establish an empire in the subcontinent. Taking advantage of the weakness of the native royalty, the East India Company obtained permission from the English authorities to take up arms against the Mughals in 1688 AD. As a result, the main reason for this conflict was the issue related to the customs of the English merchants in Bangladesh. At this time, an influential director of the English company named Joshua Child appeared. Following Joshua's expansionist policy, his brother Sir John Child blockaded the port of Bombay and seized the Mughal fleet.

Aurangzeb was enraged by the arrogant behavior and anti-state activities of the British and ordered the attack on Bombay. In 1690 AD, John Child was defeated by the emperor's forces and asked for forgiveness from Aurangzeb. The British signed a peace treaty by paying one and a half lakh rupees in cash as war indemnity and returning their occupied territories to the emperor. In exchange for the emperor's annual payment of three thousand rupees, the English company was again granted duty-free commercial rights in Bengal. From 1691 AD to 1696 AD, English merchants increased their power by securing their trading posts in Bangladesh. Then in 1690 AD, an Englishman named Job Charnock bought three villages of Calcutta, Sutanty and Gobindpur for two hundred rupees per year and built Fort William after the name of King William III. Later, the city of Calcutta was built around it. Thus Calcutta, Madras and Bombay became the powerful centers of the East India Company in the subcontinent.

Envious of the commercial success of the East India Company in the subcontinent, another new company was formed by the British Parliament in 1698 AD. The new company under the leadership of Sir William Norris became a formidable rival of the India Company in the Indian subcontinent. But when Norris failed to get commercial privileges at the court of Mughal emperor Aurangzeb, under the pressure of the British cabinet, the new and old companies were merged to form a joint company. This new company came to be known as The United Company of Merchants of England Trading to the East Indies. Until 1793 AD, this associated company had exclusive commercial privileges in the subcontinent.

From the beginning of the eighteenth century the company's commercial facilities expanded. In 1715, John Surman, on behalf of the company, went to the court of the Mughal Emperor Farrukhshiar with the intention of obtaining commercial privileges. At that time, when the Emperor Farrukhsiya fell ill, the English doctor Hamilton cured him. The emperor was satisfied with the English and granted commercial charters to the English in Bengal, Bihar, Madras and Bombay without any duties. Historian

Omar referred to this charter given by the emperor to the East India Company as Magna Carta or Great Charter.

French East India Company:

The French were the last of the European merchant communities to arrive in the subcontinent. In 1664, the French East India Company was formed under the leadership of Colbert, the financial secretary of the French emperor Louis XIV. Earlier many European merchants came to the subcontinent for trade and set up trading posts at various places. But due to not being able to facilitate the business, everyone except the English left the subcontinent and went to their homeland. The French East India Company, like other trading companies, came to the Indian subcontinent, encouraged to trade with the East, and in time established strong trading centers at Surat, Masulipatnam, Pondicherry, Chandannagar, Mahe and Calicut. The French came to the subcontinent for commercial purposes. But not being able to get the desired benefits in trade, they started interfering with the political weakness of the native nobility. Although the French did not have any political problems before 1742 AD, they became closely involved in Indian politics with the invasion of Dupleis. As a result their clash with the British became inevitable. This marked the beginning of a new chapter in the French conflict in the Indian subcontinent.

Political conditions in the subcontinent on the eve of the Anglo-French conflict:

The Anglo-French conflict in the Deccan is not an isolated incident. The Anglo-French conflict in the Deccan was part of the Anglo-French conflict in Europe. In Europe, England and France had to compete against each other for the purpose of expansion of colonies and trade in America and India. European merchant communities have been coming to the Indian subcontinent for business since long ago. Unable to maintain their mutual trade competition and balance of power, many left the subcontinent and returned home. But when English and French merchants took advantage of the political weakness of the native nobility and started interfering in Indian politics, Anglo-French conflict in the subcontinent became inevitable.

With the decline of Mughal rule in the eighteenth century, the political situation in the Indian subcontinent became extremely complex. First, taking advantage of the weakness of the Mughal Empire, the Deccan ruler Asaf-ja-Nizamul declared independence and continued to rule the country independently. Secondly, when the Deccan Marathas led by Bajirao rejected the Nizam's suzerainty, war broke out between the two. Thirdly, a province in the Deccan under the rule of the Nizam of Karnataka was ruled by a ruler named 'Nawab'. But the ruler of Karnataka with the title of Nawab denied the supremacy of the Nizam and continued to rule the country independently. Arcot was the capital of Karnataka. The political chaos in Karnataka and the Nizam and the Marathas took advantage of the conflict. English and French traders further strengthened their position in the Deccan. In such a turbulent climate, neither the Marathas nor the Nizams were able to stop the exploratory activities and activities of the foreign mercantile communities in the Deccan. Fourthly, English and French merchants increased their power in Madras and Pondicherry in the mid-eighteenth century, taking advantage of the political anarchy and disorder of the native nobility. Apart from Madras, south of Pondicherry, the British had a strong fort named St. David. As these forts were located on the sea coast, the security of the foreign merchant community depended on maritime superiority. On the other hand, the British and the French became dominant in the seas in terms of naval power as the native rulers did not have a strong navy. As a result of their naval power and maritime authority and above all the weakness of the native rulers One of the causes of Anglo-French conflict in the subcontinent was the opportunistic support for each other. Fifthly, when disputes arose regarding the succession to the thrones of Karnataka and Hyderabad, the English and the French supported the two opposing factions to maintain their respective authority. As a result Anglo-French conflict in the Deccan became inevitable.

First Carnatic War:

The First Carnatic War was the step to expand Anglo-French dominance in the Deccan. When the War of Austrian Succession started in 1740 AD, the English and the French took two opposing sides. The English and French merchant communities in the Indian subcontinent tried to remain neutral, but when the English naval commander forcibly captured some French warships, war broke out between the English and the French in the subcontinent. As the French did not have a strong fleet at that time, Dupley sent for the help of La Bourdon, the French governor of Mauritius. In 1745, when the English tried to attack the French in Pondicherry, the Nawab of Karnataka, Anwar Uddin, on Duple's advice, forbade the English to fight in his kingdom. In addition Duple's agreement was made with the Nawab that Madras would be returned to Anwar Uddin if it was captured. Meanwhile, La-Bourdon came directly to the subcontinent and took possession of Madras from the English. La-Bourdon offered to return

Madras to the British in return for suitable compensation, but Dupley refused, claiming Madras in its own right.keep On the eve of the invasion of Madras, Dupley reneged on his promise to hand over Madras to the Nawab and kept Madras in his possession. Nawab Anwar Uddin of Karnataka got angry and marched with a large army against the French. But in the battle of Mylapore, Nawab's 10,000 army was miserably defeated by only 500 French soldiers. The victory in this battle gave Duple ambitions to expand his empire in the Indian subcontinent and increased his fame and prestige. He then unsuccessfully attacked the British Fort of St. David. On the other hand, the British also failed to attack Pondicherry. As the power of the native Nawabs proved futile in the Anglo-French conflict, both the English and the French were encouraged to establish empires in the subcontinent. Finally, in Europe in 1748, the Treaty of Versailles ended the War of the Austrian Succession and peace was established between the English and the French on the subcontinent. According to the terms of the treaty, the British returned Madras to the subcontinent, but there was unrest between the two.

Second Carnatic War:

The seeds of the Second Carnatic War lay in the peace treaty signed in the First Carnatic War. Dupley ceded Madras to the English, reluctantly agreeing to the terms of the Treaty of Ayalasple concluded in Europe. Dupley realized that the power of the French was limited to Karnataka. On the other hand, the British have strong bases in Bombay and Bangladesh. Therefore, it would be easier for Duple to carry out French plans in the Deccan if he could keep Madras in his possession. Thus, the political anarchy of the Deccan and the infighting of the nobility encouraged the ambitious Duple to participate in the war.

After the Nizam's death in 1748, the political situation in the Deccan became complicated. A conflict started between Nizam's second son Nasir Jung and Dauhitra Muzaffar Jung over the heir to the vacant throne of Hyderabad. On the other hand, after the death of Nawab Dost Ali of Karnat, when the conflict between Anwar Uddin and Chand Saheb, the son-in-law of the previous Nawab, began, the ambitious Dupley got an opportunity to increase French influence and prestige by interfering in the infighting of the royals in the Deccan. He placed Chand Sahib on the throne of Karnataka and proceeded to place Muzaffar Jung on the throne of Hyderabad with his help. Duple entered into a secret pact with Chand Sahib and Muzaffar Jung and defeated and killed Anwar Uddin in the Battle of Ambu in 1749 AD. Anwar Uddin's son Mohammad Ali became helpless and took shelter of the British in Tiruchirapalli. When Chand Sahib became the Nawab of Karnataka, the French gained unchallenged power there.

The British were alarmed by the rise of French influence and prestige in the Deccan. In addition, the British could no longer remain silent when Chand Sahib, influenced by French cooperation, besieged the English protege Muhammad Ali in Tiruchirapalli. They supported Nasir Jung and Muhammad Ali and took up arms against the French. Nasir Jung soon chased Chand Sahib to Pondicherry with the help of the British and captured Muzaffar Jung by trick. But soon the fortunes of the French improved. When Nasir Jung was killed by an assassin, the French re-installed Muzaffar Jung on the throne of Hyderabad. But when Muzaffar

Jung was killed by an assassin shortly after this, French influence in the Deccan was threatened. The French commander Busi kept the French influence and prestige intact in the Deccan by installing Salabat Jung, the third son of the deceased Nizam, on the throne of Hyderabad. As a result, the French influence and prestige in the court of Hyderabad increased manifold.

When the English were facing extreme disaster in the Deccan, a talented hero named Clive appeared among them. In 1751 AD, Clive valiantly resisted the attack of Chand Saheb by capturing Arcot, the capital of Karnataka. He besieged Trichinapally and forced the French commander to surrender. Chand Sahib on the other hand was defeated and killed at Tanjore. Then Muhammad Ali ascended the throne of Karnataka with the help of the British. Thus, under the leadership of Robert Clive, the fortunes of the English in the Deccan improved. Dupley strove to preserve French influence in the Deccan. But the French government misunderstood him and removed him from the Deccan and sent him home. With Duple's departure from the Indian subcontinent, French influence in the country was shattered forever.

Third Carnatic War:

The Third Carnatic War was one of the most important wars of the subcontinent. This was the last chapter of the Anglo-French war in the subcontinent. When the Seven Years War started in Europe in 1756 AD, the war between the English and the French in the Indian subcontinent was renewed. Bangladesh was the last battlefield of the Anglo-French conflict in the Third Carnatic War. While the French commander Bussy was busy restoring his rights and prestige in Hyderabad and Madras, the English commanders Clive and Watson were engaged in war with Siraj-ud-Daula in Bangladesh. That is why Busi could not enter the war against the British in Bangladesh. The British defeated Siraj-ud-Daula in Palashi desert in 1757 AD and established British rule in Bangladesh.

In 1758 AD, Count Lally replaced Duple as the governor of Pondicherry and arrived in the subcontinent. He took possession of St. David's Fort from the English and planned to attack Madras. For this purpose he assembled the entire French army and summoned Bussy from Hyderabad. But during the Madras campaign he was intercepted by the English commanders Pigot and Lawrence. Meanwhile, when the French fleet was defeated at Pondicherry, British supremacy was established on the Coromandel coast. Then in 1760 AD, the French ruler was miserably defeated in the battle of Lali captivity by the English commander Sir Eyer Coote. After that, the French trading posts in the subcontinent were taken over by the British one by one. The British occupied Pondicherry and imprisoned Lali. Thus ended the Anglo-French conflict in the subcontinent. Then in 1763, at the end of the seven-year war, according to the Paris Peace Treaty, although the English and the French regained their respective positions in the subcontinent, it was decided that the French could not keep any army in India except for trade. After Lali returned to his homeland, he was imprisoned in the Bastille for two years to die.

The reason for the failure of the French:

In 1760 AD, with the defeat of the French commander Lali in the battle of captivity, the French influence and prestige in the subcontinent was destroyed forever. There were many reasons behind this failure of the French in the subcontinent.

Firstly, in terms of abundance and organization, English companies were richer and stronger than French companies. During the Third Carnatic War, the British were able to successfully fight the war for three years with all the money they had earned from the Battle of Palashi. On the other hand, the finances of the French company pushed them into dire straits. After Lali's arrival in the subcontinent, the French government helped him with only two thousand million francs. The financial weakness of French companies was one of the reasons for their downfall.

Secondly, the English company participated in Indian politics but did not subvert the commercial ideals. On the other hand, Dupley, unable to facilitate trade, began to interfere with the political weakness of the Indians and forgot the company's commercial ideals. As a result, the French government or the French company showed failure to relieve the company's financial difficulties on the day of danger. Another fatal mistake of the French company was the summoning of Bussy from Hyderabad. As a result, French influence in the Deccan declined and English influence and prestige increased.

Thirdly, the French East India Company was the last to arrive in the Indian subcontinent and did not enjoy the large number of trading posts and financial affluence that the English Company did.

Fourthly, naval success was one of the reasons for British victory. As the English navy was stronger than the French navy, they monopolized the South Seas. Not only that, they could collect soldiers from their homeland in times of danger. But the French had no such facilities.

Fifth, the French were largely dependent on the help of the native nobility. But the British were never dependent on the natives.

Sixth, personal conflicts, character weaknesses and lack of collective effort among the French employees were among the reasons for their downfall. Apart from this, mutual jealousy among employees, differences between Lali and Pondicherry Council etc. were responsible for their downfall. On the other hand, the English united collectively and successfully fought against the French Seventhly, the English East India Company was a private public organization free from government control. In the days of danger, this company got the help and sympathy of the government as well as the English people. But as the French company was government owned, it failed to get the help of the French people and the financial backbone of the company collapsed due to lack of regular government support. The company's financial insolvency was one of the reasons for its downfall.

Eighth, the French government made a fatal mistake by calling home a wise man like Duple at a time when the English and French were busy planning war in the subcontinent with commercial expansion and setting up arms. As a result, the return of the visionary Duple sounded the death knell of the French in the subcontinent. Therefore, it can be said that the French government's wrong policy was largely responsible for the failure of the French company in the subcontinent.

Duple's Character and Achievements:

Among the European merchant community that had come to India, Joseph Dupley possessed a remarkable personality, diplomatic acumen and great political talent. He came to the subcontinent in 1731 AD appointed as the ruler of Chandannagar. After successfully ruling Chandannagar for ten years, he was appointed the governor of Pondicherry. He was immensely brave, a daring warrior and a shrewd diplomat.

He was the first among the merchant communities that came to India at that time, taking advantage of the weakness of the Indian nobility to establish a French empire in the country. But the British created obstacles for him. He adopted various tactics to expel the British from the country and started interfering in Indian politics by training the native army in European style. He arrived in the subcontinent long after the British and established strong French trading posts in Chandannagar, Mahe, Calicut and Pondicherry with his talent and intelligence.

Dupley enhanced French influence and prestige in the Deccan by successfully defeating the English in the First and Second Carnatic Wars. With the help and support he hoped for from home, he might have been able to shake off English dominance from the Indian subcontinent. But the French government misunderstood him and ordered him to return home. With Duple's departure from the Indian subcontinent, French influence in the Deccan declined and the British became dominant. Later, the French government realized the mistake and revoked his resignation, but there was no time. So it can be said that the French government's wrong policy was mainly responsible for Duple's failure.

Credits: Duple was a shrewd politician. He was the first among the European nations to realize the futility of the power of Indian rulers. So he continued to harbor ambitions to establish a French empire, ignoring the commercial importance of the subcontinent. According to most politicians he was an opportunist and an adventurer. But the British created obstacles in his journey. Yet he displayed immense bravery in defeating the English in the First and Second Carnatic Wars and maintained French influence and prestige in the Deccan.

He was no doubt a better diplomat than Clive. But he was not his equal in military science. Historian Malson nevertheless praised his diplomatic acumen, political wisdom and organizational strength. Based on the imperialist policies he first followed in the subcontinent, later the British built a huge empire in this country.

Duplais continued his desperate efforts to establish a French empire in the subcontinent. But as a result of the secrecy of his policy and the mismanagement of the French government, the dream of establishing an empire in the subcontinent was forever extinguished.

The Nawabs of Bengal: The Mughal administration was administered in two ways—central and provincial. The central administration was usually administered by the emperor and the provincial administration was administered by the sipahshalas or subadars. Provinces were known as Subas and their rulers were called Subadars. Bengal Suba was one of the Suba of the Mughal Empire. A large amount of money was deposited in the central treasury from the Bengal Suba. That is why the Mughal emperors had a watchful eye on the Bengal Suba.

In 1595 AD, Emperor Akbar appointed Mansingh as the Subadar of Bengal. At that time Isha Khan was the leader of the Bar Bhuiyans of Bengal. He captured Isha Khan's capital Tanda and shifted the capital to Rajmahal and named the Rajmahal as Akbarnagar. He miserably defeated Usman Khan in the Battle of Bhawal. Then when Isha Khan's son Musa Khan, Kedar-Rai etc. formed an alliance against the Mughals, Mansingh completely defeated them in the battle of Ichamati. Then he returned to Delhi due to the death of the emperor.

Jahangir ascended the throne and appointed his elder brother Qutbuddin as Subedar of Bengal. But when he was killed by Sher Afghan, Islam Khan was appointed Subadar of Bengal in 1608 AD. He suppressed the Bar Bhuiyans of Bengal and established Mughal rule. Then Islam Khan defeated Usman Khan, the zamindar of Mymensingh one by one, and turned his attention to Pratapaditya, king of Jessore.

Islam Khan along with his son-in-law Pratapaditya sent Mughal forces against Raja Ramachandra and defeated them and forced them to submit to the Mughals. Islam Khan then defeated the rebel Pathans and Isa Khan's son Usman Khan in the Battle of Daulambapur and killed Usman Khan. After defeating other Pathan chieftains, Srihatta was subjugated to Bengal in 1612 AD. Thus ended the war with the Bar Bhuiyans of Bengal. Thinking about security, Islam Khan moved the capital from Rajmahal to Dhaka and named it Jahangirnagar. But unfortunately, Islam Khan died after conquering Bengal. According to Sir Jane N. Sarkar, Islam Khan's death caused irreparable damage to Bengal. Because he was the real founder of the Mughal Empire of Bengal and the best Subedar of Suba Bengal.

After Islam Khan, Kasim Khan was appointed Subadar in 1615 AD. But when he failed to show his ability, Ibrahim Khan was appointed Subadar of Bengal in 1617 AD. He was the brother of Empress Nurjahan. Soon he was able to establish peace, order and security in Bengal through his efforts. Agriculture and trade in Bengal improved a lot during his rule. Weaving industry is particularly flourishing. The importance of Dhakai muslin and Murshidabadi silk cloth in particular was highly valued outside India as well. Towards the end of Ibrahim Khan's rule, a conflict arose between Emperor Jahangir and his son Shah Jahan. Shah Jahan declared rebellion against his father and took refuge in Bengal. Shah Jahan tried to establish an independent government in Bengal with the help of Musa Khan, the Mugh Dasyu of Arakan and son of Isha Khan. As a result the peace of Bengal was disturbed. Ibrahim Khan was killed trying to stop this rebellious son of the emperor from entering the palace. Meanwhile Yuvraj Parvez with his army When Shahjahan came to Bengal, he left Bengal and took refuge in the Deccan. On the way he faced opposition from the Portuguese. It is said that here two maids of Mumtaz Mahal were kidnapped by Portuguese pirates and they refused to return them. Taking power, Emperor Shahjahan ordered to expel this uninvited foreigner from Hooghly. Kashim Khan besieged Hooghly city from all sides in 1632 AD. The Portuguese were completely defeated in this battle and fled to defend themselves. Then the Mughal army captured Kamrup.

Shah Jahan appointed Kashim Khan as Subedar of Bengal in 1628 AD. From the time of Sultan Hussain Shah of Bengal, the Portuguese acquired a lot of money through long trade and their influence and prestige increased manifold. They are arrogant. The behavior became a threat to the independence of Bengal. The Emperor sent Subadar Kashim Khan to suppress these unwanted guests. Then the Emperor sent his second son Shah Shuja as Subedar of Bengal. He performed this duty intelligently for twenty long years. Bengal was peaceful during his rule. During Suja's rule in Bengal, the British enjoyed some special privileges among foreign traders. As a result, the power of English merchants increased somewhat. In 1657 AD, when the popular emperor Shahjahan fell ill, his four sons started a conflict over the succession to the throne. When Shuja declared rebellion, Aurangzeb sent his commander Mir Jumla to Bengal to suppress him. Suja was defeated and went to Arakan with his family and was killed there. Then Aurangzeb appointed the general Mir Jumla as the Subadar of Bengal. Mir Jumla conquered Cooch Behar and Assam while he was the Subadar of Bengal. During this time, the Mughal Empire expanded to Assam. This is a unique example of his military talent. After the death of Mir Jumla, Emperor Aurangzeb appointed his maternal uncle Shaista Khan as Subedar of Bengal in 1664 AD. Shaista Khan was well educated, learned, intelligent and a skilled commander.

Shaista Khan was not in Bengal for 2 years out of 23 long years in 1664-166 AD. He was 63 years old when he came to Bengal. Being the emperor's favorite, he used to spend 21 years in Bengal in very royal pomp and splendor. Although he was old, according to the traveler William Hedges he kept a harem and his moral standards were not very high. Shaista Khan used to support a group of stables in the court. He used to earn a lot of fame by freely giving to fakirs, dervishes, saints and monks. He used to spend around Rs 1 lakh every day. Food prices were low during his time. 8 maunds of rice could be bought for Rs. He used to send expensive gifts to the king in Delhi and paid an annual revenue of 5 lakh rupees. On the other hand, based on the description of Stewart and other researchers about Shaista Khan's regime, Shaista Khan used to spend his days in pomp and splendor by exploiting the people of Bengal. Farmers were tortured by revenue officers. Revenue was collected illegally from land. Under the orders of Shaista Khan, the goods of the merchants were seized at every customs station and the customs were collected at will. Nawab Shaista

Khan himself had a monopoly on salt, betel nut and other essential commodities. 38 crore rupees were saved in his subedari in 13 years. After Shaista Khan, Aurangzeb appointed Murshid Quli Khan as Subedar of Bengal in 1700 AD. He shifted the capital from Dhaka to Murshidabad for administrative convenience.1707 AD After Aurangzeb's death, Murshid Quli Khan became virtually independent and established a new dynasty of Nawabs in Bengal.

Establishment of Nawab Dynasty in Bengal: Early Life of Murshid Quli Khan: Murshid Quli Khan was born into a Brahmin family in the Deccan. As a child he was sold to a Muslim named Haji Shafi Ispahani and was renamed Muhammad Hadi. Shafi Ispahani raised him as his own child and took him to Persia. There he was influenced by Persian language education and culture. Shafi Ispahani held the post of Dewan in the Delhi Darbar for some time and during that time Muhammad Hadi gained valuable experience in matters of civil administration. Then after the death of Shafi Ispahani, he was appointed to a new job under Haji Abdullah Khorasani, Dewan of Berar province in 1696 AD. During his stay here, he displayed unprecedented skills in governance matters. As his reputation for governance spread far and wide, Emperor Aurangzeb appointed Murshid Quli Khan as Dewan of Bengal (1700 AD) to reorganize Bengal's economy and reform its revenue.

Aurangzeb's grandson Azim-us-Shan was the Subadar of Bengal at that time. The Diwan was next to the Subadar in matters of governance. Dewan was the supreme head of the revenue department and was responsible to the Emperor for his work. Credited with restructuring the chaotic revenue system of Murshid Quli Khan's Bengal. But as the Subadar had no authority over the Dewan in matters of revenue, soon disputes arose between the two. Although the dispute between the two was settled by the direct intervention of Emperor Aurangzeb, the Emperor gave Murshid Quli Khan complete independence in matters of revenue. As a result, Murshid Quli Khan became the eyesore of the Subadar of Bengal and the Mughal officials.

Murshid Quli Khan's conflict with the Subadar of Bengal: Azim Us-Shan, the Subedar of Bengal, was a sharp minded but lazy and easy-going person. He tried to increase his income without thinking about the welfare of the people. To achieve this objective, he, like the previous princes, undermined the interests of the merchants and farmers of Bangladesh and engaged in personal trade. But when this illegal trade was banned on the orders of Emperor Aurangzeb, Azim-us-Shan interfered with the government treasury. As a result, he openly quarreled with Dewan Murshid Quli Khan. When the Subadar of Bengal planned to kill the Dewan, Murshid Quli Khan informed the Emperor Aurangzeb and on the orders of the Emperor, the Civil Department was transferred from Dhaka to Murshidabad. Later it was named Murshidabad after Dewan Murshid Quli Khan.

Murshid Quli's fortunes turned upside down: After the death of Emperor Aurangzeb, Murshid Quli Khan's fortunes turned upside down. Bahadur Shah I ascended the throne of Delhi and transferred Murshid Quli Khan to the Deccan. After the death of Bahadur Shah I in 1712 AD, Farrukhshiar, the son of Subadar Azim-us-Shan of Bengal ascended the throne of Delhi. When Murshid Quli Khan showed loyalty to the new emperor, the emperor appointed him to the post of Naib Subadar of Bengal in addition to Dewan.

Later the Emperor appointed him as Subadar of Orissa and gave him the title of 'Zafar Khan'. Then in 1717 AD, Murshid Quli Khan was appointed Subadar of Bengal and till his death he held the post of Subedar in Bengal. During his reign, Murshidabad became the capital of Bengal.

Governance of Murshid Quli: Murshid Quli Khan was one of the Mughal Subadras of Bengal. He rose to the rank of Subedar of Bengal from the lowest position in life. His regime is particularly notable in the revenue reforms of Bangladesh. Before his arrival, Bengal's treasury was facing a severe financial deficit due to various fiscal complications. Before him, especially since the establishment of Mughal rule in Bangladesh, till the time of Aurangzeb, such a well-regulated policy or procedure was never followed in the revenue matters of Bengal.

Bengal's fiscal plight: Before the arrival of Murshid Quli, the land revenue system of Bengal was plagued with various problems. The entire province was divided among the Mughal servants as Jagirs. The government had nothing to say of its own Khas land. As a result, the government did not get any income from land revenue. Trade duties were the only source of revenue for the state. This would put too much pressure on the European and native merchants. It would cause huge loss of domestic and foreign trade.

Formulation of Revenue Policies: Murshid Quli Khan adopted two main approaches to end the land revenue woes of Bengal and to increase the revenue of the government.

Namely:

First, the conversion of all Mughal servants' jagirs into government-owned land and instead allotment of jagirs in the underdeveloped and forested areas of Orissa.

Secondly, taking away the burden of revenue collection from the zamindars and placing it on the lessees.

The zamindars of Bengal paid revenue to the government on an annual basis. But over time the zamindar class became lazy and comfortable and became financially distressed and failed to pay revenue to the government on time. It was not possible in Bangladesh to collect revenue directly from the farmers as in North India. So Murshid Quli Khan appointed 'lessees' and entrusted them with the responsibility of revenue collection. His newly introduced revenue system was known as 'Malzamini'.

Murshid Quli was very strict about state governance. He did not tolerate any negligence or laxity on the part of the lessees in the collection of revenue. He used to inflict inhuman punishment on the tenants for minor crimes. He would not tolerate anyone demanding any tax beyond a certain amount of revenue.

Murshid Quli Khan surveyed all the cultivated and uncultivated lands of the province and duly recorded them in the name of the farmers. In addition, he determined the amount of revenue per block based on the productive capacity of each land.

Although most of the zamindars were evicted from their zamindari under the malzamini system introduced by Murshidquli, he provided them with proper maintenance known as 'nankar'. Again, if any zamindar was accepted to accept the new revenue system introduced by him and the contract of revenue collection, he would appoint him as a tenant.

In addition, Murshidkuli Khan converted much of the arable land in Jessore, Khulna and Mymensingh into government Khas land and raised the revenue by forcing the Nripatis of Cooch Behar and Tripura to pay a certain amount of tax annually.

Economic Reforms: Apart from fiscal reforms, Murshid Quli Khan increased the revenue of the exchequer by adopting various cost cutting policies of the administration. He reduced the number of infantry and cavalry. He adopted a liberal and tolerant policy towards the local European traders to improve the trade and commerce of the state. A fixed tax was accepted as a trade duty. During his rule, Dutch, English and French trade centers were established in Calcutta, Chuchura and Chandannagar respectively.

Trade Tariff Dispute: The British got the right to trade duty-free in Bangladesh by order of the Mughal emperors. But Murshid Quli ignored the Dastak custom or clearance of the English and arranged for the collection of conventional trade duties. In protest, the representative of the English company, Surman Samrat Farrukhsiyar, took refuge and in 1690, the agreement was executed between the representative of the company, Surman Samrat Farrukhsiyar. According to the agreement, the East India Company acquired unconditional rights in the whole of India in return for three thousand rupees per annum. As a result of this treaty, the East India Company, under the leadership of Jobcharnak, got the zamindari of three villages, Sutanti, Calcutta and Gobindpur on 24 August 1690. Then, under the leadership of Jobcharnak, the foundation of Calcutta port and city was established there. Thus, in 1700, the East India Company built Fort William fort in the city of Calcutta and obtained commercial rights in Bengal free of duty in exchange of three thousand taka per year. In addition, the English company gained the right to use 'dastak' in commercial matters. But when Murshid Quli Khan imposed restrictions in this regard, the company was forced to accept it.

Results of his revenue reforms: Murshid Quli's revenue and economic reforms increased the government's revenue manifold. As a result of this system, the farmers of Bengal were saved from the tyranny and oppression of landlords, leaseholders and Mughal employees.

Due to the establishment of trade tariffs, trade and commerce were greatly improved. As the interests of the farmers are protected, the fertility of the land increases and the government adopts a policy of lending to the farmers as per the need.

Character and achievements of Murshid Quli Khan: Murshid Quli Khan occupies a prominent place in the history of Bengal. From a humble position in life, he rose to the rank of Dewan and later Subadar of Bengal by his own intelligence and talent. His sense of loyalty and sense of duty earned him immense respect in life.

Murshid Quli Khan was a pious man of high moral character. In his personal life he avoided luxury. He appointed educated Bengali Hindus to high positions in the state. Under Murshid Quli Khan, the educated and dutiful Hindu functionaries achieved greater advancement and status. He himself was a scholar and scholar.

His reign as a ruler ushered in a glorious chapter in the history of Bengal. He established an independent dynasty of Nawabs in Bengal by his genius and wisdom. Emperor Aurangzeb himself was attracted to him after seeing his honesty and dutifulness. The emperor was solely dependent on Murshid Quli Khan for the expenses of the Deccan wars and the sustenance of the Mughal royal family.

During the rule of Murshid Quli, the education and culture of Bangladesh improved considerably. At that time Persia was the center of learning and culture. Many Persian poets and writers came to Bangladesh at the invitation of Murshid Quli Khan and brought a change in Bengali literature and culture. Murshid Quli Khan himself was a learned man and enjoyed the patronage of scholars.

English East India Company dominates India

Succession of Sujauddin: Son-in-law Sujauddin was not on good terms with his son-in-law Murshid Quli Khan, so he nominated his son-in-law Sarfraz Khan as his successor. After the death of Murshid Quli Khan in 1727 AD, Sujauddin went to Murshidabad as an army on the advice of two brothers named Haji Ahmad and Ali Bardi Khan. Sarfaraz Khan was shocked by his father's sudden arrival and renounced his claim to the throne in his favor. During his reign Bihar province was included in Bengal. When Emperor Muhammad Shah Sujauddin entrusted the administration of Bihar, he appointed Alivardi as Subadar of Bihar. After Sujauddin's death in 1739 AD, his son Sarfaraz Khan became the Nawab of Bengal, Bihar and Orissa. But when Sarfraz Khan's weak rule caused chaos and anarchy in the country, Alivardi Khan, the ruler of Bihar, defeated and killed Sarfaraz Khan in the battle of Ghiria in 1740 AD and got the throne of Murshidabad.

Ascension of Alivardi Khan: Alivardi Khan was a fortune-seeking Turk. He was appointed Naib Nazir of Bihar during the reign of Nawab Sujauddin in 1726 AD and occupied the throne of Murshidabad due to his merit and luck. Notable events of his reign include repelling the Maratha invasion and the Bargi riots. He signed a permanent peace treaty with the Marathas paying a share of the revenue of Orissa and twelve thousand rupees annually as Chauth. He granted commercial rights to the British in Bengal but did not grant any permission to build forts. However, he allowed the British to build a wall to protect themselves from Maratha attacks.

Gaining power of Siraj: Nawab Alivardi Khan had no sons except three daughters. So he gave them in marriage to the three sons of his brother Haji Ahmad. The first daughter married Ghaseti Begum to Muhammad Khan Shalamat, Maimuna to Syed Ahmad Khan and the third daughter Amena Begum to Zainuddin. When Amena Begum's second daughter gave birth to a son, Alivardi Khan affectionately named him Mirza Muhammad Ali after himself. Later this Mirza Muhammad Ali came to be known as Siraj-ud-Daula. During Alivardi Khan's lifetime, his beloved son Siraj was nominated as the heir to the throne of Bengal. Then in 1756 AD, when the old Nawab died, Siraj-ud-Daula ascended the throne of Bengal.

Siraj-ud-Daulah

After Alivardi Khan's death in 1756, Siraj-ud-Daula ascended the throne of Bengal at the age of twenty-three. But the masnad of Bengal was not a bed of flowers for him. Ascending the throne, young Siraj found himself surrounded by enemies. Siraj-ud-daulah had neither political knowledge nor diplomatic acumen, having been brought up with the utmost care of his maternal grandfather. However, the young Nawab was determined to foil the conspiracy of the anti-Nawab circle.

Alivardi Khan's two daughters were claimants to the throne. After his father's death, Ghaseti Begum, the wife of the Nawab of Dhaka (Siraj's aunt) and Siraj's half-brother Shaukat Jung, the ruler of Purnia, engaged in a nefarious conspiracy against Siraj-ud-Daulah to gain the throne. Ghaseti Begum's Dewan Raja Rajavallab started fueling it. Siraj-ud-daula cunningly seized the wealth of Ghaseti Begum and imprisoned her in the palace. Then he clashed with the British before suppressing Shaukat Jung's rebellion in Purnia.

Causes of British conflict with Siraj

After his accession to the throne, Siraj-ud-Daula had conflicts with the East India Company due to various reasons. The reasons for the dispute were as follows: First, the English violated the customary customs by not sending any tribute to the new Nawab after Siraj's accession. In addition, Siraj himself felt insulted by the haughty behavior of the English. Secondly, during Alivardi Khan's reign he prohibited foreigners from building new forts. But during the reign of Siraj-ud-Daula, on the pretext of war in the Deccan, the English and the French started building forts in Bangladesh without the permission of the Nawab, Siraj ordered them to suspend the construction of the fort. The French obeyed the orders of the Nawab but the English disobeyed it. As a result, Siraj became angry with the English. Thirdly, when the Nawab's aunt Ghaseti Begum and Shaukat Jang of Purnia were promised help against him by the British, he became angry with the British with good reason. Fourthly, native traders suffered greatly when the British used 'Dastak' freely in private trade to evade trade duties. When the Nawab ordered the English company not to abuse Dastak and to abide by the trade terms of Murshid Quli Khan's time, the English disobeyed it. As a result, Siraj became angry with the British. Fifthly, when the Nawab sent an envoy expressing his desire to visit the English Kuthi of Kasim Bazar, the British insulted the Nawab's envoy. The Nawab became very angry with the English. Sixth, the situation became complicated when some high-ranking officials conspired with the British against Siraj. At that time, Krishna Das, son of Ghaseti Begum's Dewan Rajvallabh, took refuge with the British in Calcutta with a lot of wealth from the treasury in Dhaka. When the Nawab ordered Krishnadas to be sent back to him, the British refused. Such rude behavior and hostile attitude of the English made Nawab impatient.

Nawab's arrival at Calcutta: Siraj-ud-daulah, fed up with the insolence of the English, suspended his campaign against Shaukat Jang of Purnia and marched towards Calcutta with a large force of 50,000 soldiers. On the way, he plundered the Kashimbazar Kuthi of the English and besieged Calcutta. Drake, the governor of the English company, afraid of a sudden attack by the Nawab, abandoned Fort William and took refuge at Falta, south of Calcutta by water. On June 20, 1756, 'Fort William' was captured by the Nawab. Siraj-ud-Daulah took possession of Calcutta and named itAlinagar after his maternal grandfather.

Dungeon Murder Story: On the eve of the Nawab's Calcutta campaign, Holwell and some English employees were imprisoned in Fort

William. Among them, according to the description of the historian Hollowell, it is NawabSiraj-ud-Daula known that the Nawab kept 146 English prisoners in a small dark cell measuring 18 ×
14. In the sweltering June heat, 123 of the 146
English prisoners suffocated to death in this small enclosure. The story propagated by Hollowell is known as the 'Dungeon Murder'. There is no historical truth behind the dungeon killing story. According to modern historians this is just a fictional story to incite the British against the Nawab.

Treaty of Alinagar: When the news of Andhakoop massacre and the possession of Calcutta by Siraj reached Madras, the English commanders Watson and Robert Clive quickly moved to retake Calcutta and soon they recaptured Calcutta. On February 9, 1757, the Nawab attacked Calcutta again. After a few days of fighting, the Nawab, seeing the intrigues all around him, entered into a humiliating treaty with the English. This is known as the famous 'Treaty of Alinagar'. As per the terms of this treaty, the Nawab granted all commercial privileges granted to the English by the Emperor of Delhi, war damages and permission to build Fort William at Calcutta. Despite this, Robert Clive could not be satisfied with the Nawab. He engaged in a secret conspiracy with some self-interested traitors to dethrone Siraj to protect the English company's interests in Bangladesh.

Battle of Palashi

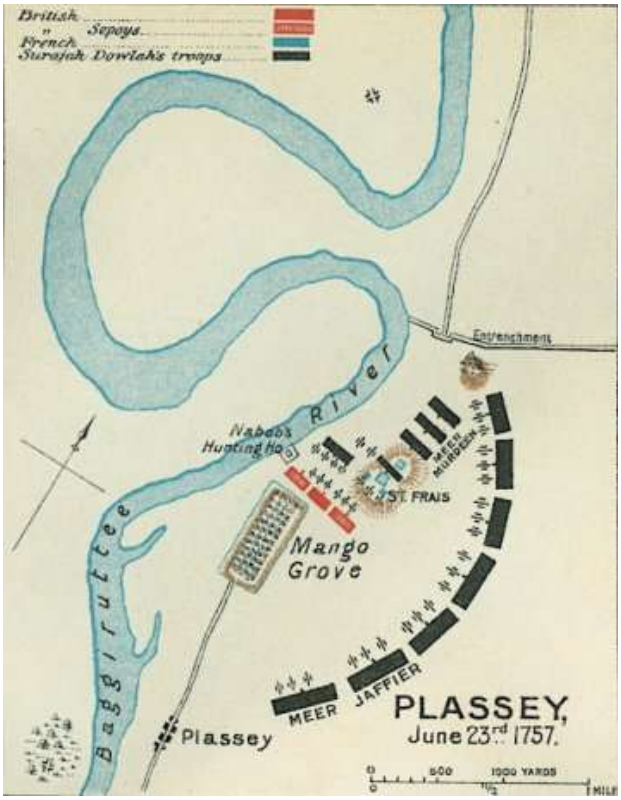

The Battle of Palashi was a landmark event in the Indian subcontinent. Although the Treaty of Alinagar was concluded, Robert Clive could not accept Siraj-ud-Daula as Nawab. He did not hesitate to plot against the Nawab whenever he got an opportunity.

Attitude of the British against Siraj: The war started between the British and the French in Bangladesh on the basis of the Seven Years' War in Europe. Clive captured Chandannagar from the French in 1757 AD despite the prohibition of the Nawab. As a result, the French took refuge in Murshidabad to protect themselves. Alarmed by the insolent behavior of the English, Siraj corresponded with Busy, the French commander of the Deccan, for appropriate punishment.

Conspiring with Clive with Mirzafar and others: Realizing the importance of the Nawab's sheltering of the French at Murshidabad and the correspondence with Busy, the sane Clive was determined to replace Siraj with his nominee on the throne of Murshidabad. His accomplices in this abominable act are some selfish traitorous natives. From the very beginning they resented the behavior of the independent-minded young Nawab and were engaged in a nefarious plot to dethrone him and install Alivardi Khan's sister-in-law Mir Zafar. Among the conspirators were Dhankubar Jagatsheth, Mir Jafar, Rajavallabh, Raydurlabh and Umichand. Realizing the importance of time, Clive broke the Nawab's treaty and got involved in the anti-Nawab conspiracy. Mirzafar Ali Khan signed a secret agreement with Clive promising to pay two and a quarter crore rupees to the British in exchange for Nababi. When Umichand threatens to reveal the secret deal, Clive cunningly creates a fake contract promising to pay him a large sum of money. When Watson refused to sign the forged contract, Clive signed it himself.

Clive declares war on Siraj: Clive conspires with native traitors and declares war against the Nawab accusing him of breach of truce. The Nawab was already aware of the exploratory activities of the British. He deployed a large force of 50,000 infantry and 28,000 cavalry on the banks of the Bhagirathi River, 23 miles south of Murshidabad. Dhurandhar Clive, with a force of 3,000 English and native troops, took up his position at Amrakanan in Plassey. Then on June 23, 1757, a battle took place at Amrakanan in Palashi on the banks of Bhagirathi river. Mirzafar Ali Khan played the role of a vigilante on the battlefield with his large army as per prior agreement with Clive. On the other hand, Nawab's devoted devotees and patriots, Mohanlal and Mirmadan fought fiercely and inflicted heavy blows on the English and upset the English army and forced them to take refuge in Ambagan in Palashi. At this time, suddenly Mirmadan was shot . He was killed by the injury. Mohanlal and the French hero Sinfra continued to fight fiercely. But the Nawab was shocked and greatly disturbed by Mirmadan's death.

Declaration of Armistice: He immediately called Mirzafar Ali Khan of Sipahsala and requested him to protect the freedom of the country by making many entreaties and even by swearing the oath of the Holy Quran.

Mirzafar Ali Khan verbal to the Nawab

Showing excessive loyalty, he continued to try to destroy the Nawab in accordance with the pre-signed conspiracy with Clive. While the generals Mohanlal and Sinfrey fought fiercely to ensure the Nawab's victory, they were deeply dismayed when the Nawab declared a cease-fire on the advice of Mirzafar.

Defeat and death of Siraj: The Nawab unknowingly brought destruction by declaring a truce on the advice of the traitorous Mir Zafar. Just as the Nawab's troops were resting after breaking the battle, Clive counter-attacked and scattered the Nawab's army. The Nawab was defeated in Palashi desert and returned to Murshidabad and tried to collect troops. Failing to raise an army, Siraj-ud-Daula, the last independent Nawab of Bengal, took his wife Lutfunnesa and daughter and left for the unknown. Finally Nawab Rajmahal was captured at Bhagwan Gola Ghat on his way back and was brutally killed by Mir Zafar's son Miron. Traitors finally won in the wilderness of Palashi.

Reasons for Nawab's Defeat:

The Battle of Palashi can be called not a major battle but a fragmentary battle. Judging by the number of casualties and the severity of the war, it can never be characterized as a major war. In this regard Malson rightly said, "Plassey though decisive, can never be considered a great battle." The reasons for Nawab's defeat in this battle are as follows:

Firstly, the political short-sightedness and lack of political acumen of the young Nawab was one of the reasons for his downfall. Secondly, Siraj's character lacked hardness and firmness, having been brought up in an abundance of maternal grandmother's affection. So many times the Nawab made the fatal mistake of pardoning the traitors and conspirators instead of punishing them despite being informed of their secret plots. Thirdly, the Nawab pardoned the leaders of Mirzafar, Umichand, Jagatsheth, Rajballab etc. several times despite knowing about their conspiracy. The weakness of holding the scepter and pardoning the traitors indirectly ensured his downfall. Fourthly, declaring an armistice despite certain victories on the battlefield shows the immaturity of his military policy, which hastened his inevitable downfall. Fifth, Siraj was inferior to his opponent Clive in terms of political wisdom, diplomatic acumen and military strategy. As a result, he falls for Clive.

Results of the Battle of Plassey:

The Battle of Palashi is one of the tragic events of the subcontinent. The far reaching results of this war were as follows:

Firstly, as a result of this war, the untimely death of the last independent Nawab of Bengal, Siraj, set the sun of Bengal's independence. Secondly, after the Battle of Palashi, Mirzafar Ali Khan succeeded the new Nawab as a vassal of the British, paving the way for British intervention in the politics of Bengal. Thirdly, even though British sovereignty was not established in the subcontinent after the Battle of Palashi, they received from the new Nawab a crore of rupees in cash and a large zamindari of 24 parganas south of Calcutta. Fourthly, as a result of this war, the British gained exclusive commercial rights in Bangladesh and the local merchants were buried. Fifthly, as a result of the victory in the Battle of Palashi, the British gained influence in the Deccan, including Bangladesh, driving out French traders and monopolizing resources in the subcontinent. Sixth, when the British influence and prestige increased after the Battle of Palashi, they assumed the role of the Nawab's creator and received a sole Clive of £334,000 from Mir Jafar in exchange for the Nawab. Later, when Mir Jafar was unable to pay the British, Clive appointed his son-in-law Mir Qasim as the Nawab of Bengal. Finally in 1764 AD the British defeated the combined forces of Mir Qasim along with Emperor Shah Alam of Delhi in the Battle of Buxar and became an unstoppable power in the subcontinent. Finally, it can be said that as a result of the Battle of Palashi, the British became the sovereign power in the subcontinent.

Character and achievements of Siraj

Siraj was the son of Amena Begum, the youngest daughter of Nawab Alivardi Khan. When he lost his father in his childhood, he was brought up with the affection, love and abundance of maternal grandmother Alivardi Khan.Young Siraj was intelligent and prudent. He participated in several wars with his maternal grandfather and showed his achievements as a warrior in suppressing the Marathas and Bargis.When Siraj-ud-Daula ascended to the throne of Bengal at the age of twenty-three after the death of his maternal grandfather Alivardi Khan, the political situation in Bengal was troubled. As claimants to the throne, Alivardi Khan's other two daughters continued to conspire against the Nawab. On the other hand, the British recklessly disobeyed the orders of the Nawab and unfairly enjoyed the commercial facilities and started building forts. On the other hand, the influential elite of the court are the independent-minded young nawabs. Angered by his behavior, he indulged in a conspiracy to dethrone him. Ascending the throne, Siraj was surrounded by rebellions and conspiracies. But the young Siraj lacked the political acumen and diplomatic acumen required to counter them. Unreasonable trust in relatives and forgiveness of criminals were among his character weaknesses. Despite knowing the conspiracies of leaders such as Mirzafar, Jagat Sheth, Umichand, Raydurlav etc., the Nawab made a grave mistake by not punishing them. The Nawab's political short-sightedness showed his dependence on Mir Jafar, ignoring the sure victory in the battlefield. And following the path of all these mistakes, Nawab's fate came close to disaster. Therefore it can be said that Nawab's simplicity, diplomatic and political ineptitude and his genuine compassion and love for all his enemies and allies were responsible for his downfall and death.

Mir Jafar (1757-60 AD)

After the death of Siraj-ud-daula, the ambitious Mirzafar Ali Khan obtained the musnad of Bengal. Mir Jafar, supported by the East India Company, turned their game by ascending the throne. According to the earlier promise, he had to pay one and a half crore rupees to satisfy the English company. They had to donate the revenue of Burdwan, Nadia and Hooghly parganas to meet the other demands of the Mir Jafar Company by paying twenty five lakh rupees to satisfy Clive alone. As a result, he became penniless by paying all the money from the treasury of Bengal to the company.

At the beginning of the reign, the rulers of Medinipur, Bihar and Purnia became dependent on the British to suppress rebellions, so he had to pay more money to the company. As a result the treasury of Bengal became empty. As Mirzafar could not pay the money as demanded by the British, he gradually became unpopular with them.

The arrogant behavior of the English towards the Nawab, disrespect and interference in governance, in addition to the appointment of an English resident at the court, made Mir Zafar impatient. To get rid of this unbearable situation, he started secret correspondence with the Dutch company. But Clive of Suchtur deposed Mir Jafar for his inability to pay earlier and placed his son-in-law Mir Qasim on the throne of Bengal (1760 AD). Mir Qasim (1760-64 AD)

Payment of the company's debts: In 1760, the British dethroned Mir Jafar and placed his son-in-law Mir Qasim on the throne of Bengal in exchange for some agreements. Mir Qasim was an able ruler and visionary politician. Ascending the throne, he tried to settle the debts owed to the English as per the treaty. The far-seeing Mir Qasim well realized that inability to pay was one of the reasons for Mir Jafar's downfall. So he got rid of debt from the company by paying cash in Burdwan, Medinipur.

Collection of Nawab's money: The Nawab consolidated his position and devoted himself to the reorganization of the administration. But before that, he received the recognition of the post of Nawab from Emperor Shah Alam of Delhi and focused on revenue reforms. He suppressed the rebellion of the proud landlords of Bengal and Bihar and levied extra taxes. He was in the previous Nawabi period

Accused of misappropriation of government funds, high-ranking officials, nobles and Mirzafar filled the empty treasury by confiscating the family's savings.

Shift of the Capital: Mir Qasim was an able ruler and a devoted patriot. He realized from a far-reaching political point of view that if the political interference of the British could not be stopped, they would become the fate of this country in the future. With a British Resident appointed in the capital, the illegal interference of the British in the affairs of the state was intolerable to the independent-minded Mir Qasim. So the prudent Nawab shifted the capital from Murshidabad to Munger to keep the administration free from English influence. He ensured its security by digging moats and building fortifications around the newly established capital. The various reasons for shifting the Nawab's capital were as follows:

Firstly, soon after gaining the throne, the British tried to dethrone Mir Qasim with the help of leaders like Jagatsheth, Raydurlav etc. So he shifted the capital of Murshidabad to Munger and made it more secure. Second, the English were enraged towards the Nawab when Mir Qasim imposed severe punishments on the tabedar servants and zamindars who supported the English. As a result, in order to free the influence of the English, they moved the capital further away from Calcutta and built a strong fort. Thirdly, he made the army well educated and equipped with the help of some European commanders. Fourthly, Munger set up ordnance factories to manufacture cannons, guns and ammunition. The British became extremely suspicious of the Nawab's code of conduct. Fifthly, if ever attacked by the English, he would repel their attack from the fortified fort or, failing that, he could take refuge in Ayodhya. Even before Mir Qasim moved the capital and adopted defensive measures, his clash with the British became inevitable.

In 1717, the East India Company was granted duty-free trade in Bengal, Bihar and Orissa by order of the King of Delhi. But the Company's business limits were set by the Nawab of Bengal granting the Company a Nawabi

Panja or 'Dastak'. This document stated that the East India Company could only purchase merchandise and other goods from native merchants. Company employees were completely prohibited from purchasing merchandise and goods from within the country. Only native merchants had the right to purchase and transport goods and merchandise from within the country and therefore had to pay duties to the government. After the victory in the Battle of Palashi, the East India Company started abusing this hammer. Corrupt officials of English companies started importing duty-free goods from within the country for personal gain. As a result, the local merchants were greatly affected in business and the Nawab himself was deprived of customs duties. Mir Qasim sent a letter to Vansittart, the governor of the Company, seeking redress for the abuse of the knock. The Nawab mentioned in the letter that while the East India Company had commercial rights free of duty in the royal order, the employees of the company did not. But they are trading freely in Dacca, Calcutta and Kashim Bazar directly defying the Nawab's knocks and the Ellis Sahib of Patna Kuthi openly opposes the Nawab. As a result, an anarchic situation was created in the internal trade of the country. Although Vansittart accepted these accusations of the Nawab as true, he personally had nothing to do. Because most of the company's councilors were there Angry with the Nawab. As a result, the Nawab failed to remedy this with the company and raised the trade duties of the local merchants along with the English merchants. Although the Nawab was affected by this, unfair commercial competition of local and foreign merchants was closed. As a result, the English company became angry with the Nawab.

Boxer's Battle:

Elis, the principal of Patna Kuthi, was enraged by the measures taken by Mir Qasim and occupied Patna. As a result, the Nawab was forced to take up arms against him. When Mir Qasim expelled Ellis from Patna and occupied Patna, the Calcutta Council declared war against him. In 1763, under the leadership of Adams, the British sent an army against Mir Qasim. The Nawab, along with his semi-educated forces, went to war against the British and was miserably defeated in the battles of Katwa, Ghiria and Udaynala and fled from the battlefield and took refuge in Ayodhya by way of Munger. Then Mir Qasim formed a tripartite alliance with the cooperation of the Nawab of Ayodhya and the Emperor of Delhi and met at Buxar against the British forces on October 22, 1764 AD. The Nawab was miserably defeated by the English commander Monro in the Battle of Buxar. He died in 1777 AD after many years of unknown residence.

Importance of boxer fighting:

The Battle of Boxer is one of the most important battles in the Indian subcontinent. As a result of this war, all the hopes of Mir Qasim were shattered and the influence and prestige of the British in the Indian subcontinent increased manifold. "The fate of the subcontinent depended on the outcome of the Boxer wars," says historian Bruce. In fact, the British victory in the Battle of Palashi was completed in the Battle of Buxar. According to Sir Stephen, "The Battle of Boxer was more important than the Battle of Plassey in the rise of British power in the subcontinent." After the Battle of Palashi, British rule was established only in Bangladesh. But the defeat of the allied forces of the Emperors of Bengal, Ayodhya and Delhi in the Battle of Buxar resulted in the subcontinent's sovereign power.

As a result, the British became an unstoppable force in the sub-continent and obtained Diwani of Bengal, Bihar and Orissa from the Emperor of Delhi.

After the Battle of Buxar, the British again gave the masnad of Bengal to Mir Zafar. After his death in 1765 AD, his son Nazimuddaula ascended the throne of Bengal in return for a lot of money. He became Nawab in name only, the real power remained in the hands of the British. As a result, the political chaos in Bengal continued to increase. Clive's return home in 1760 saw Vansittart appointed as the new governor of the Company. After the defeat of Mir Qasim in 1764, the East India Company actually began to rule Bengal. As a result, when there was extreme anarchy and chaos among the employees of the English company in Bangladesh, the English authorities again sent Robert Clive to the Indian subcontinent as the governor of the company in 1765.

Civil Profits(Diwani) of English Companies:

After Clive's return home, there was extreme anarchy and chaos in the political sphere in Bengal. When the corruption of the English employees became extreme, the company authorities again sent Robert Clive to the subcontinent in 1765 AD with full powers. Clive arrived in the Indian subcontinent and paid attention to the Nawab of Ayodhya and Emperor Shah Alam of Delhi. In 1764 AD the Nawab of Ayodhya and Emperor Shah Alam of Delhi along with Mir Qasim took up arms against the British in the Battle of Buxar. After winning the Battle of Boxer, Clive could have taken possession of Ayodhya and Delhi if he wished. But he did not do so and allied himself with the Nawab of Ayodhya, receiving fifty lakhs of rupees as war indemnity and prison and Allahabad.

Clive then signed a treaty with Shah Alam, Emperor of Delhi, at Allahabad in 1765 AD. The two districts of Kara and Allahabad received from Sujauddaula, the Nawab of Ayodhya, and Clive received the Diwani of Bengal, Bihar and Orissa from the Emperor Shah Alam of Delhi under the Treaty of Allahabad in exchange for 26 lakhs of rupees per annum. Then, in return for an annual allowance of 50 lakh rupees, he forced Mirzafar's son Nazimuddaula to entrust the company with the responsibility of collecting the revenue of Bengal. On the other hand, the power of Nizamat (judiciary and administration) remained in the hands of the native Nawab. In fact, this civil benefit of Clive played an important role in the expansion of British rule in Bangladesh and the Indian subcontinent.

Importance of Dewani: The importance of East India Company's 'Dewani' gains in the history of the subcontinent cannot be denied. Emperor Shah Alam of Delhi gave the Company on paper the right to collect the revenue of Bengal, Bihar and Orissa as well as helped to strengthen the basis of the Company's sovereignty. As a result, the East India Company turned from a small commercial institution into a political institution in the subcontinent. The prestige and respect of the English increased many folds with the men of the Indian subcontinent. After all, the civil gains of the Company firmly established English dominance over Bangladesh. In addition to the political importance of the East India Company's civil gains, economic importance is also observed. Gaining revenue power from Bengal, Bihar and Orissa increased the financial solvency of the company. As a result, the Company increased its troop numbers and became an unstoppable force in the Indian subcontinent.

English Company Dualism:

On his second visit to the subcontinent, Clive concentrated on administrative reforms. Realizing the dire importance of direct rule of the Indian subcontinent, he introduced the policy of dual rule. In this system of governance, he entrusted the responsibility of revenue and protection of the country to the company by entrusting the responsibility of the judicial and administrative department to the native Nawab. He appointed Reza Khan as Naib Nazim of Bengal and Setab Rai of Bihar on behalf of the Company to prevent anti-British sentiment among the public. Originally, they were subordinate to the Nawab, but they obeyed the orders of the East India Company. Clive's policy of dual rule was mainly intended to arouse public interest in the benefits of English rule by agitating against the native rulers to make But his efforts were not successful and there was no reaction among the native people to the benefits of English rule. In this regime the Nawab had powerless responsibilities and the Company had powerless power. As a result, anarchy is created in the administrative field. With the introduction of dualism, the power to employ the army to enforce revenue collection powers was transferred to the Company. But as the responsibility of maintaining law and order is in the hands of the Nawab, the Nawab has to approach the company for the necessary money. So it can be said that when the dual governance system is established, the power of the company increases but the responsibility decreases. On the other hand, Nawab's responsibility increased but his power came to zero. As a result, there was a deadlock in the governance system and the misery of the people reached its peak.

Due to Clive's dual rule and oppression, oppression and exploitation of the English servants, the economic condition of the people of Bengal gradually became deplorable. Looking at the economic situation of Bengal, Meckley said that the people of Bengal have never seen such cruel exploitation and oppression. Apart from this, in 1770, when the crops were destroyed due to lack of rain and drought, there was a great famine in the country. A terrible famine came over the whole country. According to Richard Becher, about 10 million people died in this famine. It is known in history as the 'Sixties Manvantara' or Great Famine. As this famine happened in 1176 Bangabd, it is called 'Sixties Manvantara'.

Flaws of Dual Rule: The dual rule introduced by Robert Clive was not without its faults. No 1 administrative complications arose when this regime was introduced. Although the Nawab was given responsibility for governance, he was given some power on the other hand the Company got irresponsible power which had no accountability. Noting the nature of the dual regime, historian Ramsay Muir said that, 'The failure of the dual regime was certain from the beginning.' Because with the introduction of this regime, the illegal business of the company's employees increased to a greater extent and when the policy of increasing the company's revenue was introduced, there was no end to the suffering of the public. A serious consequence of the dual rule was that during the Great Famine of the 1970s, the East India Company increased the rents of the peasants without waiving them. Whereas before the Great Famine the Company collected an annual tax of Rs.1 crore forty-three lakhs, in the year of famine the company's revenue collection was Rs.1 crore and thirty-seven lakhs. Therefore, if we review the tragic history of Manvantar in the 1970s, it can be easily said that the oppression and torture of the British was one of the tools of revenue collection. Misrule prevailed in the name of country governance as native nawabs and English company employees were blind to their own personal interests. Historian Kaye said about the nature of dual administration, "The dual administration made confusion more confused and corruption more corrupt."

When the story of neglect, torture and oppression of the English company in this regime was published in the British newspapers, the English people also became angry against the dual rule. The regime ended in failure when a heated debate against the dual rule broke out in distant England, and the East India Company took over the entire administration of the country. The Company sent Warren Hastings as Governor to India to protect the image and interests of the English. He took power in 1772 AD and ended the dual rule. As a result of the lapses of the dual rule, the Regulating Act was later passed in 1773 AD to regulate the administration of the East India Company on the recommendation of members of the British Parliament.

Internal reformation of the company: One of Clive's duties was to reform the company internally and prevent employee corruption. For this purpose he took some measures. First, the acceptance of all kinds of rewards and favors by the employees of the company is completely prohibited. Secondly, trading in personal interests of the employees of the company is completely prohibited. When this led to discontent among the low-wage workers, Clive granted them the right to jointly trade in salt, betel nuts and tobacco. But the company's directors didn't like it, so Clive had to order it back.

Thirdly, Clive instituted a cost-cutting policy for the company, ending the extra allowances that wartime company employees received. When this caused discontent and protests among the employees, he suppressed it with a firm hand. In the meantime, when a vocal movement started against Clive on charges of embezzlement and corruption, the Board of Directors summoned him to his homeland in 1767. Compatriots in Bangladesh raised charges against him in parliament for fraud and accepting bribes. In the end, he was proved innocent by the parliament, but fed up with the people's scorn, he committed suicide by drinking poison in 1774 AD.

Clive's character and achievements:

Clive's achievements: Despite his character flaws, Clive's contribution to the establishment of British power in the subcontinent is undeniable. Arriving in the subcontinent as a small company clerk, he has occupied a prominent place in history by establishing the British Empire in India with his talent and intelligence. Due to his immense courage and competence, he expelled the French from the Deccan and passed the test of fortune at Palashi in 1757 AD. As a result, he turned the company's commercial criteria into a scepter and became the Nawab creator in India. It is no less an achievement for him.

Clive's Corruption: After his return to his homeland, after the Battle of Buxar in 1764, he again came to the subcontinent and established a friendly alliance with Nawab Sujauddaula of Ayodhya and Emperor Shah Alam of Delhi and successfully obtained the Diwani of Bengal, Bihar and Orissa. It is one of the indicators of his diplomatic knowledge. The wartime business losses were later compensated by money he received from the Nawabs. Despite his various qualities in his character, he tarnished his character in many ways in India. For example, taking favors from Mir Jafar, cheating Umichand through fraud, embezzlement of Bengal's money by misuse of Dastak, oppression of people in Bengal by Reza Khan and Setab Roy etc. As a result of the disorganization that occurred in the administrative field of Bengal as a result of his dual rule policy, 1176 Bengali English upset the public life of Bengal after 1770. As a result, one-third of the people in Bengal died prematurely due to this terrible famine. After the removal of Robert Clive in 1767 AD, he served as Company Governor of Vérilest and Cartier until 1772 AD. But they reveal the corruption of the company's employees during Clive's tenure and the complete failure to cure the Indian famine. As a result, they were removed and Warren Hastings was appointed as the Governor of the Company and sent to India (1772 AD).

Chapter Two

English Colonial Rule: Company Period

Primary Disadvantages of Hastings:

The primary difficulties during Hastings' reign were as follows:

First, one-third of the people of Bengal died prematurely in the terrible famine of the 1970s. As a result, many villages and green areas of Bengal became desolate and fertile land turned into desert.

Secondly, due to Clive's policy of dual rule, administrative complications arose in the country and the economic backbone was broken. As a result, the treasury becomes empty.Third, because of weak governance, company officials become corrupt. They indulge in business and dishonest means of making money for personal gain. As a result, the judicial system is also immersed in corruption.Fourth, the rise of Maratha power in the Deccan was a threat to British power. On the other hand, Hyder Ali of Mysore was looking for an opportunity to expel the British and take revenge. In such a dangerous environment, Warren Hastings had to take over the administration of Bengal. While describing the socio-economic condition of Bengal at that time, historian Sir Alfred said, "The fortunes of the English in the subcontinent were sunk to the lowest level due to corruption."

Hastings' Constitutional Reforms: Hastings played an important role in the history of British India for various reform activities. Prior to his assumption of power, the company's governance was plagued by multiple problems and corruption. He was promoted to the post of governor and devoted himself to the reformation of governance by settling internal disturbances. The reforms introduced by him are discussed below:

End of Dualism: The end of the dualism introduced by Clive is a significant event of Hastings' reign. As a result of corruption and anarchy in this regime, the status of the British in Bangladesh came down to the lowest level. Formerly the company enjoyed the privileges of revenue and civil profits, but all the civil responsibilities belonged to the Nawab was vested. In 1772, Hastings abolished the posts of Deputy Nawabs of Bengal and Bihar on charges of tyranny.

He brought the revenue and civil responsibilities under the control of the company. Then Reza Khan and Setab Roy were deposed and transferred to Calcutta for trial.

Revenue Reforms: Hastings carried out important reforms in the revenue system and entrusted it to English officials called collectors. A board of revenue was formed by shifting the treasury from Murshidabad to Calcutta to prevent corruption and proper management of the revenue department. To fill the void in the treasury, Hastings increased the company's income by introducing a five-year maximum lease of land leases. In history it is known as Panchkula settlement. In this system, money-grubbing landlords bought land revenue settlements at high prices and earned money from the people through oppression. As a result, the sufferings of the people go beyond the limit.

Hastings won wide acclaim for the judicial reforms introduced by Clive. He separated the judiciary from the revenue department and established a civil and criminal court in each district. Earlier, the burden of adjudication of all revenue and land related cases was entrusted to the Diwans. In order to make the judicial system efficient and speedy, Hastings assigned the jurisdiction of civil cases to revenue collectors and the jurisdiction of criminal cases to native judges. Besides, he is the seat of civil court and a seat in Calcutta called Appellate Court He increased the efficiency of the judiciary by establishing two high courts called Nizamat Adalat. The Sadar Civil Court consisted of the Governor and two members of his Council and the Sadar Nizamat Court was headed by the Nawab or Nazim himself. He conducted the judicial work with the help of native qazis and muftis. However, the Nawab's approval was required before any death sentence could be executed.

Economic Reforms:

Hastings took over the administration at a time of extreme crisis in Bengal. He took a million pound loan from the British Parliament to save the famine-stricken people of Bengal from the severe famine. That's why he took over the administration and adopted a cost reduction policy to pay off the company's debt and improve finances. He paid twenty-six lakhs of rupees annually to Emperor Shah Alam of Delhi and captured Kara and Allahabad by force and again paid 50 lakhs of rupees to the Nawab of Ayodhya. He increased the company's income by reducing the annual allowance of the Nawab of Bengal from 32 lakhs to 16 lakhs. In addition, he displeased his councilors by hiring British troops against the Rohillas to Nawab Sujauddin of Ayodhya for 40 lakh rupees. Even King Chaitsingh of Varanasi and Begums of Ayodhya were not spared from his lust for money.

Hastings' Ayodhya Policy: Hastings' foreign policy was to make the British power omnipotent in India by deception. Hence, like Clive, Hastings also tried to make Ayodhya a strong intermediate state between the English and the Marathas against a possible Maratha attack. For this purpose, he signed the Treaty of Varanasi by giving 26 lakh rupees annually to Maratha protege Emperor Shah Alam and forcibly occupying Kara and Allahabad for 50 lakh rupees annually to the Nawab of Ayodhya. The agreement also stipulated that Ayodhya would have to bear the responsibility of maintaining the amount of British troops that Hastings would help the Nawab of Ayodhya. It was this Treaty of Varanasi that later involved him in the Rohilla War. Although the Treaty of Varanasi and his behavior with Emperor Shah Alam are acceptable in the political context, it is not at all acceptable from the moral point of view. The Treaty of Varanasi bears witness to the inferiority of Hastings.

Rohilla War:

The inhabitants of the present United Provinces were known as Rohilla Afghans. Rohilla Sardar Hafiz Rahmat Khan, fearing the Maratha invasion, signed a defensive peace treaty with the Nawab of Ayodhya in 1772 AD in the presence of General Robert Barker. The agreement stipulated that Hafiz Rahmat would pay 40 lakh rupees to the Nawab of Ayodhya if he would help the Rohillas against the Maratha invasion. Eventually the Rohillas were attacked by the Marathas and as per the treaty the Nawab of Ayodhya sent an army to help the Rohillas. But at that time when the succession conflict took place in the capital of the Marathas, they suddenly set up an army camp and went to their homeland. The Rohillas were saved from the Maratha attack without a single fight. According to the agreement, Nawab Sujauddaula of Ayodhya demanded 40 lakh rupees from Rohilla Sardar Hafiz Rahmat, who asked him to consider the matter. As a result, the Nawab of Ayodhya signed a new treaty with Hastings asking for the help of British troops against the Rohillas in exchange for 40 lakh rupees. Thus, in 1774, with the help of British troops, Sirajuddaula • defeated the Rohillas in the battle of Miranpur Katra and included Rohilkhand in Ayodhya. Rohilla chieftain Hafiz in battle Rahmat was killed. Hastings has been variously criticized by historians for hiring British soldiers in exchange for money, and he also had conflicts with his own councilors. Despite this, Hastings was able to increase his income by paying off the company's debts through illegal means of earning money. For all these unethical and unethical acts, Hastings was roused to anger among the people of the country, and finally he was impeached in the Parliament of England for his actions in the sub-continent. Yet his tireless efforts in the subcontinent saw Clive's fledgling British Empire become an all-powerful one.

Warren Hastings : Regulating Acts (1773 AD)

The East India Company was formed in 1600 AD by the efforts of 218 English merchants during the reign of Queen Elizabeth I of England and Emperor Akbar of Delhi. Later another rival company came to India named 'Merchants of London'. In 1702, these two companies merged and became known as the United East India Company. The company played an important role in the expansion of British rule, first in Bangladesh and later in India.

Since the East India Company was a private company, its governance was conducted by the Board of Directors from the beginning. But over time, with the expansion of the company's empire in India, its administrative complications and chaos began to emerge. As a result, this company located in distant India had to apply for financial assistance to the British government for no reason. One of the reasons behind the legislation was the British government's provision of financial aid to the company to protect the countrymen from the Manwantar of Bangladesh during the 1970s.

In order to resolve the structural problems and administrative complications of the company, the Regulating Act (Regulating Act) was formulated by the Prime Minister of England, Lord North, and approved by the British Parliament. The Regulating Act enacted in 1773 played an important role in solving India's administrative problems. In this act, the British East India Company was temporarily brought under the control of the British Parliament from the control of the board of directors. The number of members of the company's board of directors is reduced to 24 and the directors are elected for four years only by voting by the shareholders. The Act also provides that the Board of Directors shall submit to the British Treasury all revenue correspondence received from India and all military and civil information to the British Cabinet.

In this Act, the Governor of Bengal was elevated to the rank of Governor General of India. The governance of India is vested in the Governor General and a Council consisting of four members. Members of the Governor General's Council are appointed by the King or Queen of England on the recommendation of the Board of Directors. The right to appoint future company employees is vested in the Board of Directors meeting. However, it is decided that any problem in the Governor General Council will be resolved by majority vote of the members. The Governor General shall be the President of the Council and sometimes in case of equality of votes the Governor General may cast an additional vote as the President of the Council. The Madras, Bombay Presidency along with the Calcutta Presidency were vested in the Governor General of Bengal and the Council. They are entrusted with the responsibility of fiscal policy and foreign policy of the company. A Supreme Court was established in Calcutta with a Chief Justice and three other ordinary judges in this governing law. The salaries of the Governor General, Chief Justice and Councilors are fixed by this Act.

Council members and Chief Justice: Hastings was appointed the first Governor General of Bangladesh according to the Regulating Act. To assist him in his work, General Clavering, Colonel Monson, Richard Burwell and Sir Philip Francis were appointed councilors or members of the Governor-General's Council. Hastings' childhood friend Sir Eliza Impey was appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court

Defects in the Regulating Act: Due to various defects in the Regulating Act, the administrative deadlock was subsequently created. Its drawbacks are discussed below:

First of all, the power conflict between the Governor General and the Council started due to the lack of clear demarcation of powers in this Act. Secondly, as the authority and powers of the Governor General of Bengal were not specified over the Governors of Madras and Bombay Councils, these two governments were running independently.

Thirdly, this Act established the Supreme Court as the highest court to have jurisdiction over British citizens in India and to try crimes. But later when the Supreme Court started interfering in the civil and administrative and judicial matters of native citizens, many complications arose.Fourthly, as the powers of the Governor General and the Supreme Court judges were not specified in this Act, the conflict of power started between the two later.Fifth, because the Governor-General did not have much power over the Council, all but Burwell began to oppose Hastings. As a result, a deadlock was created in the Governor General's Council. Condemnation of the Rohilla policy against him for not being able to ignore the opinion of the majority party, appointment of British Resident in Lucknow, annulment of treaty signed with Nawab Sujauddaula after the death of Ayodhya, acceptance of Utkoch etc. led to conflict between Hastings and members of the Parishad. Later, the Charter Act amended the Act.

Hastings and Nandakumar:

Nandakumar's execution was a scandalous chapter in Hastings' reign. As the Regulating Act did not clearly delineate the powers of the Governor General and members of the Council, Hastings was not deterred from exercising unchallenged powers. When he started making money in India through various illegal means and by accepting extortion, complaints started coming against the Governor General from all sides. A conflict between the Governor General and the Council members arose when the members of the Council protested against such outrageous and illegal actions of Hastings. At this time, the complaint brought by Nandakumar against Hastings attracted the attention of the council members. In 1775 AD, Nandakumar Hastings brought a complaint to the Calcutta Council that he had accepted a bribe of 350,000 rupees from Munni Begum, the widow of Mir Jafar. When the council members demanded an inquiry into the allegations brought by Nandakumar, Hastings dismissed the council and dissolved it. Meanwhile, in order to defend himself, Hastings brought a charge of forgery against Nandakumar in the Supreme Court by a person named Mohan Prasad. The Supreme Court executed Nandakumar before the fraud charges against him were proved.

The execution of Nandakumar by Hastings opened a scandalous chapter in the history of British India. While some historians have expressed the view that Nandakumar's execution was justified, Beveridge and Alfred Loyle have referred to it as the most heinous crime. According to them, Nandakumar was killed by his childhood friend Eliza Impey in self-defense as the accusations against Hastings came one after the other. Some historical trials of Nandakumar Even if it is claimed to be neutral, it can be said that it is not accurate. Because there was a provision for capital punishment in the law of England for the crime of forgery, but there was no such provision in the Indian law. Yet the High Courts or Supreme Courts established in India under the Regulating Act were only to try the offenses of English servants—not Indians. Judged in that direction, the execution of Nandakumar by the Supreme Court was not reasonable. Burke and Elliot rightly say, "Hastings killed Nandakumar at the hands of Esper."

First Maratha War (1775 AD)

The intervention of the British in the succession conflict of the Marathas led to the First Anglo-Maratha War. After the death of Peshwa Madhav Rao, his younger brother Narayan Rao assumed the post of Peshwa, Khullatat Raghunath Rao killed him and declared himself Peshwa. But in the meantime Narayan Rao's pregnant widow gave birth to a son. This child is known as Madhav Rao Narayan. Most of the Maratha chieftains Sindhia and Holkar favored Madhav Rao Narayan for the Peshwa post, and the Brahmin Nanapadnavish, the greatest diplomat in the Maratha kingdom, was appointed his guardian. Raghunath Rao was exiled and sought refuge in the Bombay Council and concluded the Treaty of Surat with the British in 1775 AD. It was decided that Raghunath Rao would give them Salsette Island and Basin Port in exchange for the post of Peshwa. But the Calcutta Council abrogated the Treaty of Surat and concluded the Treaty of Purandar in 1776 AD and supported Madhav Narayan Rao against Raghunath. In return, the company gained the port of Solsett. But the British authorities approved the decision of the Bombay Council. As a result, when the war between the Marathas and the English began in 1778 AD, Hastings was forced to support Raghunath Rao's side as per the directives of the director meeting.

Treaty of Wargaon: The British forces advanced from Bombay towards Poona and were soon besieged by the Maratha forces from all sides and were miserably defeated in the Battle of Teligaon in 1779 AD and signed the Treaty of Wargaon. According to the Treaty of Wargaon, the British authorities agreed to annex the conquered places. But war broke out again when Hastings refused to be bound by the humiliating terms of the treaty. At this time, a group of soldiers under Commander Godard was sent from Bangladesh to return Raghunath Rao to the Marathas. Gordard allied with the Maratha leader Baroda Gaikwad and captured Ahmedabad and the basin. But in 1781 AD, Godard was defeated in the battle of Poona and fled

Treaty of Salbai (1782 AD): After the British general Popham captured Sindhia's capital Gwalior, he was forced to make a treaty with the British. However, the first Anglo-Maratha war came to an end when the Treaty of Salbai was concluded between the English and the Marathas in 1782 AD through his mediation. According to the terms of this treaty, the Marathas got back the places occupied by the English and in return the British got the port of Salcete. The British recognized Madhav Rao Narayan as a Peshwa and arranged an annual stipend of three lakh rupees to Raghunath Rao.

Significance of Treaty: Although Hastings' Maratha policy was unsuccessful for the time being and suffered substantial financial losses, it must be admitted that it indirectly paved the way for British expansion. According to this treaty, the British did not have to fight with the Marathas for twenty years. As a result, the English resisted the French attack and got an opportunity to fight against Hyder Ali of Mysore.

Anglo-Mysore War: Hyder Ali

Hyder Ali's Childhood Life: Hyder Ali was born in 1721 AD in a very simple farmer's family at a place called Buddhikot. Once upon a time, Muhammad Ali, the grandfather of Hyder Ali, used to earn his living by farming in a village in Mysore. Hyder's father, Fateh Muhammad, served in Mysore and Arcot as a common soldier in early life. father's

After his death, Hyder Ali also started life as a fortune-seeking soldier. Hyder Ali did not know education. But he was immensely brave, sharp-witted and possessed of extraordinary memory.

Career of Hyder Ali: Hyder Ali started his career as a petty soldier under Nanjaraj, the Commander-in-Chief of Mysore State. Within a few days he became Nanjaraj's favorite for his efficiency and faithfulness. It was under Nanjaraj that he participated in the Anglo-French conflict at Hyderabad and Trichinapally as a supporter of the European army.

Samar gained important experience about martial methods. Then in 1755 AD, Haider Ali was appointed as Fajdar of Dindigul. Since then Hyder Ali's power and influence gradually increased.

The plight of the Mysore kingdom: At this time Nanjaraj and his brother Devaraj took advantage of the weakness of the royal family of Mysore and became all-powerful. As a result, the king of Mysore, the generals and Nanjaraj became the playthings of Devaraj. All the powers of the state were vested in the hands of the generals Nanjaraj and Devaraj. Their misrule led to growing discontent among the army and constant Maratha attacks created great chaos in the Mysore kingdom. At this time, Hyder Ali conspired with the army to overthrow his patron Nanjraj and established himself in power. Thus Hyder Ali became the future ruler of the Mysore kingdom.

Due to economic and administrative chaos, the Mysore Raj entrusted all the powers of the state to Hyder Ali. Hyder Ali was soon able to restore peace and order to the state due to his administrative skills. Soon he tried to extend his dominion over the neighboring kingdoms. In 1764 AD, he conquered the regions like Bednur, Sunda, Kanara, Savanur and conquered Malabar and Coorg. During this time he captured some parts of Maratha and Nizam kingdom. As a result, his war with the Marathas became inevitable.

In 1761 AD the Maratha power was defeated in the Third Battle of Panipat but not completely destroyed. Under the leadership of Madhav Rao, the Maratha power revived again and took up plans to expand the empire in the Deccan. But the only obstacle for the Marathas to expand their empire in South India was the Mysore kingdom and its ruler Hyder Ali. Hence, when the Maratha power planned to dominate South India, their clash with Hyder Ali became inevitable, and the Mysore kingdom and the Marathas were at war for a long time.

First Anglo-Mysore War: Hyder Ali maintained good relations with the British even after the capture of the Mysore kingdom. But after Hyder's invasion of Malabar, the British started harboring an anti-Hyder attitude. The British became hostile towards Hyder, especially in Mysore. Therefore, the first Anglo-Mysore war started in South India as a result of mutual suspicion, misgivings and minor incidents.

The French helped Hyder Ali to seize power in the kingdom of Mysore. So when the Anglo-French war broke out in the Indian subcontinent in response to the Seven Years' War in Europe, Hyder Ali supported his ally the French side.Hyder Ali hoped that if the French were victorious against the British, he could easily capture Trichinapally, Madura and parts of Karnataka. Hence, as Hyder Ali helped the French in the Third Carnatic War, his conflict with the British became inevitable.

In addition, the secret conspiracy of the British to reinstate the deposed King of Mysore made Hyder Ali very worried. So Hyder Ali concluded an alliance with the French for his security and appointed French soldiers and generals in his army.

Nawab Muhammad Ali of Arcot was the arch enemy of Hyder Ali. Hyder Ali became hostile to the British when the British supported Muhammad Ali in the state dispute. After that, Hyder Ali offered peace to the English Government of Madras, but the Madras Government rejected it. The war with Hyder Ali became inevitable due to the exclusive policy of the British government. Then in 1766 Hyder again proposed peace to the Bombay government in search of peace. In this proposal, Hyder Ali reiterated his pledge not to oppose the British, but the British government rejected his proposal. So, forced to do so, Hyder Ali signed a protective alliance with the Nizam of Hyderabad for his own safety. As a result the Nizam left the English side. Thus, when the joint forces of Nizam and Hyder Ali attacked Karnataka, the first Anglo-Mysore war began.

When the joint forces of Nizam and Hyder Ali attacked the English commander Smith near Changam, he took refuge in the fort of Trinomial. When Hyder Ali was defeated by the British in the battle of Trinomial, the Nizam left Hyder Ali's side and made a treaty with the Madras government. Through victory and defeat, Hyder Ali suddenly attacked Madras in 1769 and forced the Madras government to negotiate. According to the terms of this treaty, both returned the conquered places and prisoners of war to each other and the British government agreed to give military assistance to Hyder in case the kingdom of Mysore was attacked by another enemy.

Second Anglo-Mysore War (1780 – 87 AD)

Hyder Ali was looking for an opportunity against the British to take revenge when the British violated the terms of the treaty concluded during the First Anglo-Mysore War. When the American War of Independence began in 1776, the French supported the rebels. As a result, England declared war on France. Following the American War of Independence, the British in India captured the French-held port of Mahe. But as the port of Mahe belonged to Hyder Ali's kingdom, he protested against this right of the English. But failing he declared war against the English and formed an alliance with the Nizam and the Marathas and fought against the English. The combined forces soon defeated Colonel Bailey miserably and captured Arcot. Defeated, Monroe took refuge in Madras. When English dominance in Madras was threatened, Hastings sent a force under Sir Ayrcot against Hyder Ali. At the same time that Hyder Ali led the combined Shakti Sangh and was eager to increase his power to assert British supremacy, the British commander Sir Ayrcot cunningly cut off the Nizam and the Marathas from the Shakti Sangh. With indomitable courage and morale, Hyder Ali led a war against the British with the help of his son Tipu and was defeated by Sir Ayrcot in the Battle of Portanovo in 1781 AD. but commanded by Colonel Braithwaite at Tanjore The army was miserably defeated by Tipu. In the meantime, when two French naval ships arrived to help Hyder Ali, the situation of the English became very critical. But when Hyder Ali died in 1782, his son Tipu became Sultan and continued to fight against the British. In 1783, a peace treaty was signed between England and France in Europe, but the war continued in India. Finally, in 1784, peace was established between the British and Tipu Sultan through the Treaty of Mangalore.

Haider Ali's character and achievements:

Haider Ali started life as a petty soldier and earned a prominent place in Indian history by virtue of his talent and efficiency. His immense bravery and extraordinary intelligence helped him rise to the throne of glory. He raised Mysore to the status of an independent state by establishing a kingdom from the rank of a petty soldier and winning several battles against the British. If he could have kept intact the combined Nizam-Maratha alliance against the British, he might have driven the British out of India. But he failed to execute his plan due to the misunderstanding of the Marathas and the Nizam. There is no doubt that he was a skilled warrior and a skilled general. Although English historians tried to tarnish his character in many ways, the people of Deccan and Mysore remember him with gratitude.

Hastings and Chaitsingh: After the Maratha and Mysore wars, the company faced financial depression. So Hastings did not hesitate to earn money in various illegal ways. He separated Varanasi from the Nawab of Ayodhya and annexed it to the British Empire through an unfair treaty. Since then King Chaitsingha of Varanasi had been paying annual tribute to the company regularly. He first accepted five lakhs of rupees from Chaitsingh on the false pretext of French invasion, but later extorted another two lakhs of rupees by force. In addition, Hastings demanded 1,000 horses from Chaitsingh and a fine of 50 lakh rupees for delay in sending them. To collect the fine, Hastings went to Varanasi and imprisoned Chaitsingh in the palace. As a result, when the people of Varanasi declared rebellion and attacked Hastings, he took refuge in Chunar. Later he ousted Chaitsingh and gave the zamindari to one of his relatives in exchange of 40 lakh rupees per annum. Such brutal treatment and heartlessness of Hastings towards Chaitsingh has greatly tarnished Hastings' character in the history of British India.

Injustice to the Begum of Ayodhya:

Sujauddaula's wife and mother were known as Begum of Ayodhya. During Asafddaula's reign, Hastings repeatedly pressed him for late payment of taxes owed by the company. When the company failed to pay its dues on time, Hastings sent a group of soldiers to Ayodhya to collect the money.

They tortured the Begum and extorted 76 lakhs of rupees and in addition they kidnapped the Begum's gold ornaments.

Hastings ushered in one of the most infamous chapters in the history of British India in terms of brutality. Torture on Begum shows his cruelty. As a result, the image of the English in India was greatly damaged.

Pitt's India Act (1784 AD):

Background: In 1784, the Prime Minister of England, William Pitt, enacted a law to correct the defects in the regulating law. Pitt's Act was enacted after the Regulating Act was in force for eleven years. This Act elevated Hastings from the position of Governor of the Company to the title of Governor General, and during his reign the power of the Company greatly increased. The various activities undertaken during Hastings' rule in the Indian subcontinent could not be supported by the Parliament of England. The futility of this law has already been proved if the defects of the regulating or controlling law attract the attention of the conscious public of England. Thus, before the enactment of Pitt's Indian Acts in 1784 AD, the Act completely failed to define the responsibilities and authority of the British Government in matters governing the East India Company, the respective responsibilities and authority of the Company's Board of Directors, the Governor General and the Council, and the powers between the Presidencies of Calcutta, Madras and Bombay. . Hastings himself once admitted the company's administrative corruption in the Indian subcontinent. After the Great Famine in 1770 AD, when the company requested financial help from the British government to rebuild the economy of Bengal, the British Parliament's intervention in the company's rule in the subcontinent became inevitable. Therefore, Pitt's India Act was enacted to clarify and strengthen the British government's authority over the company by correcting the errors in the regulating law.

The provisions of Pitt's Indian Government Act are as follows:

(1) This Act vested the military and civil powers of the Company in a Board of Control consisting of six Privy Councillors. A British Cabinet Minister was appointed as the Chairman of the Board of Control. Basically he became the Minister of Indian Affairs.

(2) In this Act, it was decided to transmit the secret instructions and decisions of the Board of Control to the employees of the company in India through a secret committee formed by three directors of the company.

(3) By this Act the Participant Meeting is deprived of the power to alter or modify the fine decisions of the Board of Control and the Secret Committee.

(4) The Governor-General shall be assisted in the administration of India by a commander and two councilors.

(5) The Governor General is empowered to supervise and control the activities of all the Presidencies of India. As a result, the control power of the Bengal Presidency over the Bombay and Madras governments was established. Because the Governor General was basically the head of the Bengal Presidency. As a result, similar administrative rules were developed in all the presidencies of India. An additional Act was enacted in 1786 AD to empower the Governor-General to override the decisions of the Council in special cases and to assume the post of Commander-in-Chief.

(6) Pitt's India Act also enshrined the declaration that "conquest and imperial expansion are foreign to the national dignity and policy of England."

Pitt's India Act remained in force till 1858 AD. The effectiveness of this law in dealing with the political situation in England and India at that time is undeniable. The Act corrected the defects of the Regulating Act and increased the status and powers of the Governor General and established the authority of the Calcutta Presidency over both the Madras and Bombay Presidencies. The Company's sovereign powers over the Indian Empire were vested in the British Parliament.

Defects in Law: Despite the sovereign powers of Parliament over the Indian Empire, the Company continued its free trade policy until 1813 AD and dualism was introduced. The division of power between the company and the board has left companies indifferent to the governance of India.

Secondly, although the Board of Control was given the power to control the Board of Directors, the Board was actually under the control of the British Cabinet. On the other hand, the British Cabinet had no responsibility for the governance of India.

Resignation and impeachment of Hastings: The impeachment of Hastings is an important event in the history of British India. Since 1782 AD, various complaints against Hastings have come to the attention of the British authorities. Disagreement with the Governor General Council was one of the reasons for this. Apart from this, the participation of British soldiers in the Rohilla war as mercenaries, the unjust execution of Nandakumar, Hastings' mistreatment of Chaitsingh, his disrespectful behavior towards the Begum of Ayodhya, all the abductions created great anger and protests against Hastings in the minds of the English people. In 1784, William Pitt became prime minister and strongly condemned Hastings' misdeeds and misconduct. In the meantime Sir Eliza Impey returned to the country on the orders of the British Parliament. A motion of no confidence against Hastings was adopted in the British Parliament in the face of strong protests by the people of England. As a result, Hastings was forced to resign and return home in 1784.

After his return home, he was indicted in the House of Commons on the basis of twenty-point charges, identifying him as an enemy of mankind in India in the name of the British nation. Orators such as Burke, Ceridon, Fox etc. denounced him in fiery speeches and accused him in Parliament. After 7 long years of trial, he was acquitted and was released by the grace of the countrymen. After his release, Hastings lost his mental peace in self-deprecation and died in 1818. Although Hastings' actions in India are reprehensible in the eyes of humanity, his contribution to the expansion of the British Empire is undeniable, it must be admitted. Historian Roberts called him the greatest English ruler as the second founder and expander of the British Empire in India.

Hastings' Character and Achievements:

Historians' Opinion: Warren Hastings is a controversial figure in Indian history. Historians have conflicting theories about his character. Some historians have described him as greedy, treacherous and corrupt. The atrocities of the Rohilla war, the execution of Maharaja Nandakumar, the misbehavior with the Begums of Chaitsingh and Ayodhya were severely criticized by Meckley, Burke and the eminent English historians Mill and Beveridge and Criticized. Dr.Smith and modern historians have praised Clive's intelligence, bravery, political wisdom and organizational genius in strengthening the foundations of the infant British Empire in India. Basically, his actions in India, reprehensible and reprehensible from the point of view of justice and humanity, but can be said to be excusable from the point of view of politics.

Taking power at a difficult time of British rule: Hastings took over the rule of Bengal at a difficult time of British rule in India. Bengal's economy collapsed in the mid-1970s, the evils of the dual rule introduced by Clive created anarchy and chaos all around. Hastings took over at such a critical moment when the public was oppressed by corrupt English officials. At this time, the rise of Hyder Ali of Mysore and the Maratha power in India caused grave danger for the British. On the other hand, the influence and prestige of the French was against the interests of the English. In the absence of a good ruler, the employees of the company used to leave the larger interest and run the business for personal interest. According to Sir Alfred Loyal, the fortunes of the British in Bangladesh had sunk to the lowest level. Hastings was no slouch. He established the Company's status and British supremacy in India by defeating all the opposing forces one by one with patience and bravery and diplomatic maneuvers.

Ending Dual Rule: One of Hastings' achievements as a ruler was to end dual rule by placing the burden of revenue collection on the Company's employees called collectors. He canceled the posts of Deputy Nawabs and sent Reza Khan and Setab Roy to Calcutta for trial on charges of torture and oppression.

Revenue Reforms: Hastings carried out important reforms in the revenue department and entrusted it to English officials called collectors. He transferred the treasury from Murshidabad to Calcutta, established the Board of Revenue or the Board of Revenue for the purpose of proper management of the revenue department and to prevent corruption. To fill the void in the treasury, Hastings introduced the land revenue system of five-year leases. It was known as Panchkula settlement. Following him, Cornwallis later attempted to establish a permanent system. As a result of the fiscal policy he introduced, he was soon able to fill the gap in the exchequer by repaying the loans taken from Parliament.

Judicial reform: Reform of the judiciary is one of the achievements of Hastings. He modified the judicial system introduced by Clive and established a civil and criminal court in each district. Earlier, the responsibility of the judiciary was vested in the Dewans who collected the revenue. Hastings abolished this system and transferred the burden of civil court proceedings to the collectors. Criminal jurisdiction is vested in domestic judges. He set up two High Courts in Calcutta called Sadar Civil Court and Sadar Nizamat Court in Calcutta. Its administration is entrusted to the Governor General and the Native Nawab respectively.

Economic Reforms: Among the notable reforms of Hastings' reign, his economic reforms were very important. He intervened in economic reforms with the aim of totalizing British power in India by trickery. Taking over the governance of India, he broke the treaty with Emperor Shah Alam of Delhi and 26 lakh rupees per annum given by Clive and forcefully took back Kara and Allahabad from the emperor and handed it over to Ayodhya in exchange of 60 lakh rupees. In addition he increased the necessary revenue by reducing the annual allowance of the Nawab of Bengal. Although the policies adopted by him were reprehensible in the eyes of humanity, it helped to increase the company's income

Cost-cutting policy: He adopted the cost-cutting policy of employees to increase the company's income. He outlawed all English servants who carried on business for personal gain. In addition, he also stopped the extra allowances that the employees were getting during the war. As a result there is dissatisfaction among the employees of the company. But he was able to suppress it with great severity.

Hastings engaged in various illegal means of earning money to strengthen the company's financial prosperity and British power in India. He accepted three hundred and fifty thousand rupees from Munni Begum, Mirzafar's widow, in exchange for the Nawab. Opposing this and demanding justice, Maharaja Nandakumar was prematurely killed by Hastings' childhood friend and Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, Sir Eliza. On the other hand, the breach of the treaty of Varanasi bears witness to his aggressive action towards Ayodhya. In addition, his policy towards Chaitsingh, mistreatment of Ayodhya's Begums and forced extortion of money tarnished his national character. He resigned in 1784 and was impeached in Parliament when accusations of corruption were presented against him from all sides. After 7 long years of trial, he was acquitted. Finally, he was released by the grace of the countrymen. Everything he did for the English nation in India was in favor of the English national interest, so he said sadly - I gave you all and you have rewarded me with confiscation, disgrace and life of impeachment. He repented in self-pity and finally fell to his death in 1818 AD.

Lord Cornwallis:

Cornwallis's accession to power

After the resignation of Warren Hastings, Sir John Macpherson, a member of the Council, was appointed acting Governor-General. He ruled India for only one and a half years. During his tenure the company faced an extreme crisis. Surrounded by the enemy on all sides, the company had to engage in direct combat against the Marathas and Tipu. On the other hand, the British had to take precautionary measures against the Sikhs and Gurkhas of Punjab and Nepal. At the most critical moment of the company, in 1786 AD, one of the commanders of the American War of Independence, Cornwallis was appointed as the Governor General of India.

Cornwallis' reformation of rule

Cornwallis' reign is particularly important in Indian history for his reformative work. He reformed the system of governance introduced by Hastings and established the basic structure of Indian governance. His reform works are mentioned below- (1) Suppression of corruption among company employees, (2) Judicial reforms, (3) Trade reforms, (4) Land reforms.

Anti-corruption of employees: Cornwallis was born into a noble family in England. Arriving in India, he was distressed by the nepotism and corruption of the company's employees. Employees forget the interests of the company and conduct business for personal interests. In India, the expenses of the company's employees were higher than their income. So they were trying to increase their personal income through various illegal means and taking advantage. Cornwallis was the first to outlaw private trade or illegal means of making money by increasing the wages of servants. He formulated the 'Cornwallis Rules' and laid the foundations of the Indian Civil Service by clarifying the procedure for employees.

Judiciary Reforms: Judiciary reforms were notable events during Lord Cornwallis' reign. He separated the judiciary from the revenue department and assigned its responsibilities to separate employees. Earlier, the duty of administration of justice was entrusted to the revenue collectors. He divided the courts into civil and criminal courts in the new system and entrusted the administration of justice to Munsefs and Amins. A civil court was established in each district and an English judge was appointed. They generally supervised the proceedings of the lower courts and tried cases arising with the help of Indian jurists. Cornwallis established four provincial courts at Calcutta, Murshidabad, Patna and Dhaka for appeals from lower courts and appointed English judges. A high-powered Sadar Diwani Adalat was constituted with the Governor General and his councilors. They set up mobile courts. They used to travel all over the country to try cases and criminal cases.

Police: Cornwallis divided the provinces into districts to make the Indian administration more organized and well regulated. Districts were again divided into police stations and authority was delegated to the police. The District Commissioner was the all-time leader of the district. He maintained peace and order in the district through the Magistrate and Superintendent of Police. In this way, the responsibility assigned to the local landlords to maintain peace and order was undermined.

Trade Reforms: Trade reforms were another notable reform of Cornwallis' reign. English employees were encouraged to trade for personal interests at the expense of the company's interests. Earlier all the goods which were exported from India to England were purchased by English employees as contractors from native merchants. As a result, the company would have been deprived of huge dividends. Cornwallis abolished this trade and introduced a system of procurement of goods directly from native merchants. He kept a strict watch so that there was no repression or oppression on the native merchants.

Among the British rulers, Cornwallis was the first to introduce Indian governance. It is true that he introduced the Cornwallis Act to bring order to the English civil servants, but by depriving Indians of high posts and usurping the local powers of the zamindars, bureaucratic deadlock ensued. As a result, theft and robbery increase in the country.

Permanent Settlement (1793 AD)

The Permanent Settlement was one of Lord Cornwallis' reforms. Although he introduced this system, he was not the inventor. The director council advised Cornwallis to settle the revenue with the zamindars over a period of ten years. When Cornwallis took over the administration of the country, the land revenue system was rife with various forms of corruption and disorder. Hastings introduced the first five-year settlement. But it was not fruitful due to various reasons.

Firstly, in this system, the person who agreed to pay the highest rate of rent, the company would usually settle the land for a period of five years.

Secondly, even though the zamindars accepted land revenue settlement at a higher rate, their ownership of the land was not recognized for more than five years. As a result, if the revenue could not be collected within the specified period, the rent would be left.

Thirdly, as the permanent ownership of the land was not recognized by the zamindars, they did not make any effort to develop the land. In addition, they tried to earn money through various types of injustice and torture during certain periods. Due to the tyranny of the landlords, many people stopped cultivating the land and the value of the land decreased.

Fourthly, Hastings introduced the annual system to remedy this situation. But it increases evil. As a result both landlords and subjects suffer. To get relief from this economic crisis, Cornwallis adopted a plan to introduce a permanent settlement.

Lord Cornwallis's contribution to land revenue reform cannot be denied. He realized the importance of land revenue reform by reviewing the evils of the quinquennium and annual system introduced by Hastings. Because Cornwallis himself was the son of a landlord. Therefore, he tried to link the interests of the landlords with the happiness and sorrows of the subjects in the land development in this country in imitation of England. He realized that if the zamindars' permanent title to the land was recognized, they would strive for the development of the land and the welfare of the people, and would pay regular revenue from loyalty to the Company. Before the introduction of this system, Cornwallis introduced the ten-year settlement in 1789 after consultation and discussion with the District Collectors on the amount of annual revenue, the importance of land settlement and the protection of the ryots from the oppression of the zamindars. He assured the zamindar that he would make the arrangement a permanent settlement if approved by the directors' meeting. Despite various controversies, approval was obtained by the Cornwallis Directors' Meeting on 19 September 1792.Then on March 22, 1793, he declared the ten-year settlement of Bengal, Bihar and Orissa as permanent.He recognized the zamindars as the permanent owners of the land on the basis of a fixed annual rent. As well as the land.The policy of auctioning zamindari for non-payment of rent was also announced. The zamindars were exempted by the company taking on the responsibility of maintaining peace within the zamindari.

The benefits of permanent settlement were as follows:

Merits: Historians differ about the merits of the Permanent Settlement. While discussing its merits it is highly recommended to keep in mind the pros and cons of landlords, subjects and government.

First, since government revenue was fixed on land and the ownership of zamindars and peasants recognized, both zamindars and peasants sought to increase the productivity of the land by employing capital and labor.

Secondly, as the income of the company is fixed as a result of the permanent settlement, it facilitates the government in taking necessary measures in governance and expenditure management.

Thirdly, as a result of this system, a group of zamindars loyal to the British was created in Bangladesh as well as in England and they continued to work faithfully as loyal to the British until 1857 AD.

Fourthly, as a result of permanent settlement, wealthy zamindars dug canals and wells and established schools and hospitals for the betterment of the subjects. Besides, they provide loans to the subjects due to famine due to heavy rains and lack of rains. Demerits: According to various historians, the permanent settlement had more demerits than merits.

Its defects are discussed below:

First of all, due to the lack of distribution of land through fair survey in this system, revenue is determined in excess of idle land and due to the fact that the limits of the land are not determined, litigation is subsequently created.

Secondly, though this system improved the condition of the zamindars, there was no change in the fortunes of the peasants. If the wealthy zamindars left the burden of zamindari on Naibs, Gomstads and stayed in big cities, oppression and oppression of farmers increased. As a result, the people became careless in agriculture. Later the Tenancy Act was enacted to protect the subjects from the tyranny of the landlords.

Thirdly, one of the defects of this system is that the subsequent increase in the value of land did not increase the income of the government. As a result, the government is deprived of the dividend of increased revenue.

Fourthly, Cornwallis wanted to change the fortunes of the landlords in this country in favor of the landlords of England. But as their permanent title to the land was recognised, the zamindars became hereditary passive. The landlords did not pay attention to the development of the land as they were not afraid of losing their land. On the other hand, since the ryots had no rights, they did not try to develop the land. As a result, due to non-regular collection of revenue, the rent remains unpaid.

Fifthly, the company faced deficits as the landlords could not pay rent regularly. As a result, the sunset law was passed and orders were given to the landlords to pay the arrears of rent within a specified period. Many zamindars lost their zamindari and became destitute due to not being able to pay the rent on time.

Sixth, the Muslims of Bengal were the worst affected by the Permanent Settlement. Gradually the authority of the revenue and administrative departments passed from them to the hands of the English collectors.

foreign policy: Lord Cornwallis's foreign policy was aimed at maintaining goodwill and a peaceful policy with all. That is why he adopted a neutral policy towards the native princes except Tipu Sultan alone.

Third Battle of Mysore

Although the Second Mysore War was ended by the Treaty of Mangalore, Tipu realized that war with the British was inevitable today and tomorrow. Therefore, Tipu Sultan maintained secret contacts with France, Constantinople and Mauritius to increase military power.

Lord Cornwallis was a shrewd politician. In 1788 AD, after receiving the place called Guntur from the Nizam, he promised him military assistance. Cornwallis deliberately omitted Tipu's name from the alliance formed in 1789 AD. As a result, Tipu was angry with Cornwallis and attacked Trivandrum, an ally of the British, in 1789 AD. Cornwallis went to war with the Nizam and the Marathas against Tipu. Tipu resisted the Allied advance for a long year and was finally defeated. In 1792, Cornwallis besieged Tipu's capital Srirangapatna and forced him to make a treaty. According to the terms of the treaty, Tipu Sultan was forced to hand over three crore three million rupees in cash and half of the kingdom to the British. Tipu's two sons were detained in Calcutta as a token of peace. As a result of this treaty, the British got Malabar, Coorg, Dindigul, Bara Mahal. The Marathas gained the north-west of Mysore and the Nizam the north-east. Thus half of Tipu Sultan's kingdom was divided between the English Marathas and the Nizam.

Sir John Shore (1793 AD)

After Lord Cornwallis, Sir John Shore was appointed Barlat of India. He adopted a policy of total indifference or neutrality in disputes between native princes under Pitt's rule of India. Shor's indifference caused dissension among the British allies in India. As a result, the prestige and status of the English in India decreased to a large extent.

A notable event of Shore's reign was the revolt of the English servants. In the end, he accepted the demands of the employees and quelled the revolt. Because of his weakness, the English authorities summoned him to his homeland. Then the British authorities sent Sir A. Clarke as the Governor General of India. He ruled India for only one year.

Lord Wellesley: Policy of subordination:

Introduction-

After Sir John Shore, Lord Wellesley was appointed Governor General of India in 1798 AD. He was a fierce imperialist ruler. As a member of the Board of Control, he had earlier had the opportunity to gain experience of India. But despite having a clear idea about India, he took over at such a critical moment; As a result of John Shore's liberal policies, anti-Indian forces rose to the fore and threatened British sovereignty in India. His reign was the last chapter in the dominance of the Company and the Indian powers. As a result of John Shore's indifferent policy, Wellesley faced many problems after taking over. First, Tipu Sultan of Mysore liaised with the rebel Jacobin Club of France and the French ruler of Mauritius to avenge the British after the Third Anglo-Mysore War. In addition, he continued to prepare for war against the English by having his army trained by French commanders. Second, the Nizam was displeased with the British for not helping the Nizam against the Marathas as per the Company Kharda War Agreement, and equipped his own army under the command of the French general Raymond. Thirdly, Daulat Rao Scindia raised an army against the British under the command of a French general. Fourthly, all Malabar princes except Coorg turned anti-British. Fifthly, Zaman Shah of Kabul's threat of conquest of India made the British panic. Sixth, at that time the French Emperor Napoleon was planning to conquer India. Seventhly, the financial condition of the company at that time was very deplorable. When the British Empire in India was afraid of war preparations and attacks from outside enemies, Wellesley took over the administration of India and proceeded to face the enemies.

Policy of subordination:

Lord Wellesley was a fierce imperialist ruler. Strategically strengthening British power in the subcontinent was one of the goals of his imperial policy. That is why he tried to destroy the French influence and prestige from India and establish the English influence and dominance in the politics of the native royalty. He believed that "the welfare of the people of India can only be achieved if British power, prestige and influence are extended in India." So he rejected the neutral policy of the previous ruler John Shore and adopted the imperialist policy. In history it is known as the policy of subordinate alliance.

Lord Wellesley was a shrewd imperialist ruler. On his arrival in India, he noticed the reluctance of Indians to get help from foreigners. Therefore, he was careful to make the Indian royals dependent on the British military power by applying the policy of subservient alliance. The purpose of this policy was, firstly, that the Indian subjects bound by the subjugation alliance could not declare war or make treaties against any other state without the permission of the British Government. Second, any country bound by the Subsidiary Alliance policy would maintain a contingent of British troops in their state and release either cash or part of the state to the British to meet expenses. Thirdly, all European servants and citizens, except Englishmen, were to be expelled from the allied native states. In return for the above conditions, the British Government will assume responsibility for the security of the countries bound by the Subsidiary Alliance. As a result of the adoption of the submissive alliance policy, the Indian princes had to surrender their political independence to the British government.

Foreign Policy:

The policy of subordinate alliance was not formulated by Lord Wellesley. The Board of Directors invented this principle long ago. But due to lack of time it was not possible to implement it. During the time of Lord Wellesley, when favorable conditions arose, he was the first to apply this policy and proceed to take away the political freedom of the Indians. The ultimate aim of Wellesley's imperialist policy was to make British power absolute in India. That is why he exerted foreign policy pressure on the weaker states by depriving Indian states of their political independence and destroying French influence. During Wellesley's reign three powers prevailed in India. They are the Nizam of Hyderabad, Tipu Sultan of Mysore and the Maratha League. The imperialist Wellesley's attention was first focused on these three forces. When the defeated Nizam of Kharda was afraid of the Maratha invasion and busy making allies, Wellesley invited him to adopt a policy of subservient alliance. For self-defense, the Nizam allied and gave the Tungabhadra and the south of the Krishna river to the British to meet the expenses of the British army. Thus, when the Nizam became dependent on the English, the French influence was removed from Hyderabad. Opposing the submissive alliance policy, Tipu suffered and the Maratha power was defeated. Thus Lord Wellesley established British sovereignty by subduing the powerful states in India one by one.

Anglo-Mysore War: Tipu Sultan

Ever since the treaty of Srirangapattam, Tipu Sultan was hostile to the British. He tried to get military help from countries like France, Mauritius, Kabul etc. and restored the forts damaged in the third Anglo-Mysore war. He re-equipped the army with some French volunteers.

Lord Wellesley, suspicious of Tipu's vast military equipment, continued to prepare against him despite the opposition of the Madras Council. First, after Wellesley completed his war preparations, Tipu invited the Sultan to adopt a policy of subservient alliance. But the independent minded Tipu gallantly refused his invitation. As a result, Wellesley declared the Fourth Anglo-Mysore War against Tipu in 1799 AD. The combined forces of the British and the Nizam attacked Tipu's kingdom from both sides. Lord Wellesley's brother Arthur Wellesley commanded the Nizam's forces. When Tipu's kingdom was attacked from two sides, he fought bravely and was defeated by the English commander Harris in the Battle of Malveli. But later his When the capital Srirangapattam was besieged, he fought like a hero and was finally killed. Tipu's son Bikram fought and was finally forced to surrender. Thus the Mysore dynasty founded by Hyder Ali came to an end and the British were relieved to be able to depose a power like Tipu.

After the war, Tipu's kingdom was divided into three parts. Two parts were divided between the British and the Nizam, and the rest was given to a person from the ancient Hindu dynasty of Mysore—from whom Hyder Ali had usurped the kingdom. The overall supervision of this state was entrusted to Arthur Wellesley. The new king of Mysore was forced to pay annual tribute by binding him to a subservient alliance with the British. However, Tipu's two sons are provided with allowances.

Character and achievements of Tipu Sultan

Tipu's Valor: "Tipu Sultan is a name, a ray of light" in the history of British India. The bravery and fearlessness he displayed in defending the country's independence against the British earned him the status of a patriot in Indian history. He single-handedly took extreme preventive measures against the British during the worst period of Muslim rule in India. Had the Nizam and the Marathas not misunderstood him and cooperated with him, the history of British India might have been written differently. Although his efforts were not successful that day, he awakened the spirit of freedom in the minds of the people by his death. That is why the name of this fearless and independent brave soldier is remembered with gratitude in the history of British India's independence.

Tipu's Achievements as a Commander: Tipu achieved achievements as a brave warrior and valiant soldier. He took up arms against the British with his father and defeated the British commander Braithwaite in the Second Mysore War, gaining immense honor and fame. After the death of his father, he gained power and took on the role of expelling the British from the Deccan. He defeated the British and forced them to sign the Treaty of Mangalore on some inferior terms. But the third and fourth Anglo-Mysore wars brought disaster to his fortunes. He made all possible efforts to expel the British from this country. He extended a helping hand to France, the French rulers of Mauritius and Kabul in the hope of gaining foreign aid. But no one came forward to give him active assistance except verbal assurances and moreover he failed to get help from the Nizam and the Marathas. Surrounded by enemies on all sides, Tipu's fearlessness on the battlefield and bravery as a commander have given him immortality in Indian history.

Tipu as a Ruler: Tipu showed skill as a good ruler. He tried to improve agriculture by establishing good governance throughout the empire. He showed his dedication by improving the communication system and ensuring the justice of the people for the expansion of trade and commerce. As a devout Muslim, he showed generosity towards religion. He gained the patronage of the Hindu community by donating money for the renovation of Hindu temples. He could not tolerate the English. That is why he equipped the army with modern education to drive them out. Therefore, it can be said that due to Tipu's efforts, the rapid commercial expansion, economic prosperity, improvement of communication system and military equipment of the then Mysore state could be compared to any country in the world.

Other Qualities: Tipu was a brave warrior and just ruler like his father. In personal life he was a hardworking and pious person. He might have lived happily for the rest of his life if he had accepted the policy of subservient alliance with the English. But he valued the independence and self-respect of the country more than the happiness and comfort of his personal life. That's why he didn't want to become an ally of the British by compromising the independence of the country. He also showed considerable skill in diplomacy. He was the only Indian ruler who understood the importance of foreign military aid to drive out the British.

Tipu's personal qualities and popularity could not be tolerated by the British. That is why they tried to tarnish his character in many ways. English historian p. E. Robert called him cruel, barbaric. Lord Cornwallis is described as savage and insane and Will Come as a bigoted Hindu hater. But in personal life Tipu was a simple, simple, learned and pious liberal ruler. Many Hindu servants were engaged in his reign. He gave religious freedom to all the people irrespective of caste and religion. He could speak Urdu, Persian and Kannada. Unable to tolerate Tipu's heroic conduct, the British tried to undermine him.

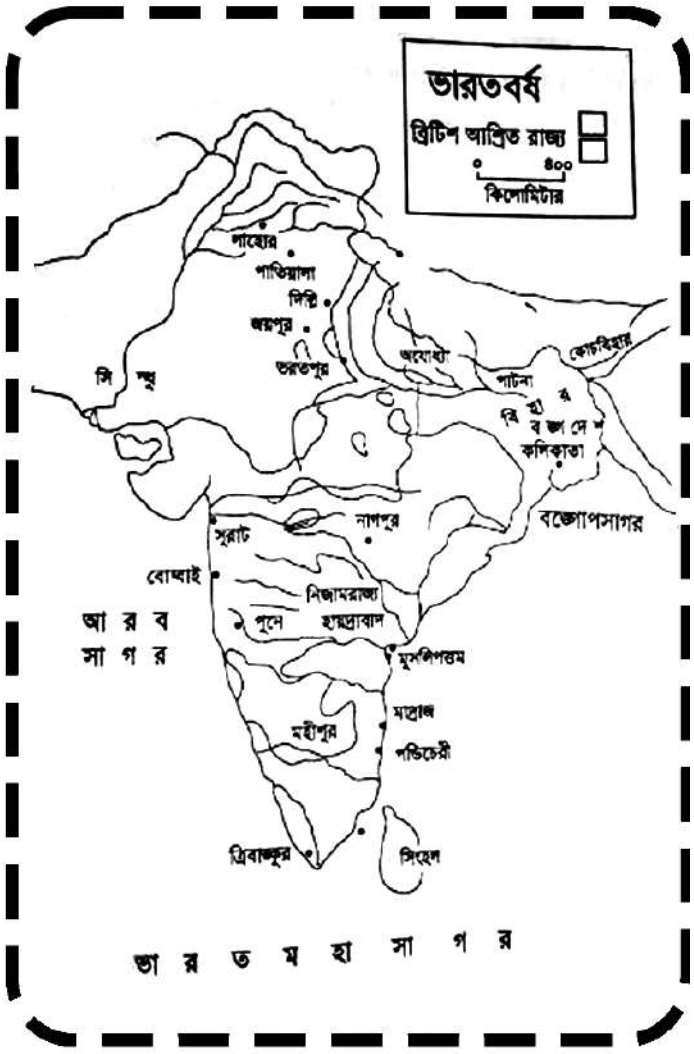

Success of Wellesley's progressive policies:

Lord Wellesley was a fierce imperialist ruler. His submissive alliance and progressive policy are not separate policies. He applies these two principles for the same purpose. Basically, he proceeded to establish English supremacy by adopting a policy of subservient alliance towards the great powers, increasing British authority and adopting a policy of expansion towards the native states.

Capture of Tanjore and Surat: Wellesley, in pursuit of his imperial ambitions, usurped the political independence of several native states by applying the policy of subordinate alliances. He took advantage of the succession conflict in the Tanjore kingdom and forced the king of Tanjore to adopt a policy of subservient alliance. Under the terms of this policy, the King of Tanjore ceded his kingdom to the British in return for an annual allowance. Then the imperialist Wellesley cast his greedy eye on Surat. When the Nawab of Surat died childless, Wellesley denied his brother's claim and occupied Surat.

Capture of Karnataka: He then turned his attention to Karnataka. Administrative deadlock prevailed in Karnataka since the beginning of dual rule. On charges of secret conspiracy with Tipu of Mysore, an enemy of the company, Wellesley deposed the Nawab of Karnataka and occupied Karnataka.

Occupy of Ayodhya: Ayodhya was not spared from Wellesley's imperialistic policy. But Ayodhya existed from the beginning as an ally of the British and as an intermediate state between the Marathas and the British. Wellesley forced the Nawab of Ayodhya to sign a new treaty to strengthen the security of the north-west frontier on the pretext of misrule and considering the possibility of Zaman Shah, the grandson of Ahmad Shah Abdali, invading India. According to this agreement, Gorakhpur, Rohilkhand and part of the Doab had to be given up to the company. Wellesley's Ayodhya policy has been adversely criticized by historians.

Wellesley's Maratha Policy

Wellesley's policy towards the Marathas: One of the achievements of the imperialist Wellesley was the destruction of the Maratha confederacy. After the death of the famous Maratha leader Nanaphadnavish in 1800 AD, there was a political vacuum and chaos among the Marathas.

Acceptance of Peshwa's Subordinate Alliance: During the reign of Peshwa Baji Rao II, Daulat Rao Scindia and Jasobanta Rao Holkar engaged in a suicidal conflict with each other. Both of them were defeated by Jaswanta Rao Holkar near Poona when the Peshwa supported Sindhia's side. As a result, Peshwa Bazi Rao II escaped and signed the Treaty of Besin with the British in a subservient alliance. According to the Treaty of Besin, Biorick was accepted to pay 26 lakh rupees towards the expenses of the British troops for his security. The Treaty of Bassein was an important event in the expansion of British dominance in India. It tied the Maratha chieftains to British subjugation and dealt a severe blow to the Maratha Shakti Sangha.

Opposition to the Treaty of Besin: Sindhia and the Bhosla Raj of Berar found the Treaty of Besin humiliating and forgot their differences and started preparing for war. When the Treaty of Besin was signed, the repentant Peshwa secretly supported their activities. When the Maratha army was deployed on the frontiers of the Nizam's kingdom, the British government requested the Maratha leaders to withdraw the army. But when the Marathas refused to remove the army, the war started in 1803 AD. But Jashwanta Rao Holkar adopted a completely neutral policy in this regard.

Defeat of the combined forces by Arthur Wellesley: When the combined forces of Scindia and Bhosla were defeated in the Battle of Amai by Arthur Wellesley in the Deccan, Scindia withdrew from the war. But Bhosla continued the war alone and after being defeated again at Wargaon, he submitted to the British by the Treaty of Deogaon. According to the terms of this treaty, he was forced to leave places like Cuttack, Baleswar etc. to the British.

Scindia's submission: Then Lord Lake's army defeated Scindia miserably at Aligarh and the outskirts of Delhi. Undeterred, Scindia Surji signed the Treaty of Arjungaon and bound himself into a subservient alliance. As a result of this treaty, he was forced to cede the territory between the Yamuna and Ganga rivers and some parts of Rajputana to the British. Then in 1804, a group of British soldiers were deployed in his state.

War with Holkar: Holkar adopted complete neutrality in the Second Anglo-Maratha War. After the war, he conducted campaigns against the Rajput states allied to the British. Wellesley was enraged by Holkar's behavior and declared war against him. But the British commander was defeated by Colonel Monson Holkar and forced to take refuge in Agra. Even though Holkar was defeated in the battle of Dig by the English commander Lordlake, he started to destroy the British territories one after another. Senapati Lek Holkar's allies attacked the Jat king's Bharatpur fort four times and failed. Finally Lord Lake was forced to make a treaty with the Raja of Bharatpur. In the meantime, Wellesley's state expansion policy was not supported by the English authorities, so he was summoned to his homeland. British expansionist policy in India was abandoned by British authorities and Sir John Shore's policy of neutrality was adopted. As a result, Holkar was saved from certain destruction.

To conclude, Lord Wellesley was a fierce imperialist ruler and occupies a prominent place among the founders of the British Empire in India. Hastings saved from certain destruction the British Empire that Clive would one day establish in India. But Wellesley by his singular efforts consolidated the great expansion and security of the empire.

Wellesley's achievement

Taking over at a critical time: Lord Wellesley is one of the founders of the British Empire in India. As an imperial ruler he occupies a prominent position. He took over the management of the company at a critical moment of British rule in India. When he arrived in India, the three powers of Nizam, Maratha and Tipu were very strong. On the other hand, Napoleon's threat of conquering India and Zaman Shah's plan to attack Delhi made the British power panic.

Dependence of Indian Powers on British Aid: But the far-sighted Wellesley was a deterrent. When the Nizam who was defeated in the battle of Kharda was busy making alliances due to the fear of Maratha invasion, the tactful Wellesley bound the Nizam to the alliance by applying the policy of subordinate alliance. He defeated and killed Tipu Sultan of Mysore and annexed the kingdom of Mysore to the British Empire. He then destroyed the Maratha Shakti Sangha and made Sindhia, Bhosla and Holkar dependent on the help of the Hungarians.

His Diplomatic Skills: Lord Wellesley followed the policy of expansion and intervened in the politics of the native princes and destroyed the French influence and prestige by placing all those states directly under British rule. The main aim of his imperialist policy was to destroy the British power in India by deception. Clive is said to have founded the British Empire in India; Hastings saved it from certain destruction. And with Wellesley's sole efforts, the foundation of the British Empire in India was firmly established. It is true that Lord Wellesley's submissive alliance policy made India a powerful British Empire. Wellesley took away the political independence of Surat, Karnataka and Tanjore and placed them directly under British rule. Although the capture of Ayodhya is condemned by historians on the pretext of misrule, it was absolutely necessary to capture it to protect the border.

Governance: Apart from the expansion of the empire, Wellesley was very focused on the internal governance of the country. He established a college for Europeans at Fort William in Calcutta. But as the British authorities did not support it, it became a center of Indian language education.

He carried out the necessary reforms of Sadar Civil Court and Sadar Nizamat Court in Calcutta along with the improvement of trade and commerce. Instead of the Governor-General in Council, he appointed three judges from among the Company's employees to administer two courts. When the company's finances collapsed due to the war, he encouraged employees to take up private trading. But the board of directors of the company did not approve his arrangement and sent him home.

Lord Cornwallis (1805 AD): Lord Wellesley's policy of imperial expansion was not liked by the authorities in England, so he was summoned to his homeland. Then in 1805 Lord Cornwallis was appointed as the Governor General of India for the second time. Cornwallis was a shrewd politician. He came to India for the second time and followed the neutral policy instead of the imperial policy of Lord Wellesley. He tried to make peace with the Maratha leaders, Sindhia and Holkar. But before executing his plan, he died in 1805 AD.

Sir George Barlow (1805-07 AD): After the death of Cornwallis, Sir George Barlow, a member of the Calcutta Council, was appointed temporary Governor General of India. He adopted a policy of indifference and neutrality as directed by the authorities. Although he made peace with Sindhia and Holkar, his policy differed with the Nizam and the Peshwa. When the Nizam of Hyderabad tried to break the terms of the policy of subservient alliance, he forced him to comply. Within a short time, George Barlow was able to restore internal peace and order and restore the financial soundness of the company. One of the most important events of George Barlow's reign was the Sepoy Mutiny at Vellore. At this time Indian soldiers were ordered to use a type of turban. In addition, when the Indian soldiers were ordered to shave their beards and cut tilak on their foreheads, they declared mutiny for religious reasons. The rebel sepoys killed 113 British sepoys including 14 officers by doing. The rebels were soon put down with a heavy hand and Tipu's two sons were transferred from Vellore to Calcutta on charges of indulging with the rebels. William Bentinck, governor of the Madras Council, failed to quell the rebellion and was ordered to return home.

Lord Minto (1807-13 AD): In 1807 AD, Lord Minto succeeded George Barlow as the Governor General of India. Prior to this he was the President of the Board of Control. He was in favor of following a neutral policy. But given the political situation in India at that time, it became impossible for him to maintain neutrality. Within a year of his arrival in India, the Diwan of Trivandrum rebelled and killed a number of British soldiers including the British Resident. As a result, he has to be suppressed with a strong hand. Dewan finally committed suicide after feeling the horror of the punishment.

During Minto's reign England was at war with Napoleon in Europe. So he tried to destroy the French influence from the neighboring states in India. He failed by sending British envoys to Persia and Kabul to destroy French influence. He created an alliance with the Amirs of Sindh to prevent the spread of French influence. He captured Mauritius and the Bourbon Islands to eliminate French influence from the Indian Ocean. Then he occupied Java in 1811 AD. Thus, when he occupied the French colonies in the Indian subcontinent, the British had no other rivals. Finally, in 1815 AD, when the peace treaty between France and England was established in Europe, peace was established between both of them in India. Except for Mauritius, both occupied territories were forced to abandon each other.

A notable event of Lord Minto's reign was the establishment of diplomatic relations with the Sikhs. He sent Charles Metcalf to Ranjit Singh's court and brokered a treaty at Amritsar. According to this treaty, a permanent peace treaty was concluded between the Sikhs and the British states by defining the Satadru River as the boundary between them. As a result, the British empire expanded up to Satadru river without a single war.

Lord Hastings (1813-23 AD): After Lord Minto, Lord Moira or Hastings was appointed Governor General of India. He was strongly opposed to Wellesley's radical imperialist policies. But when he entered India, the political and economic situation in India was so critical that he was reluctantly forced to adopt the imperialist policy followed by Wellesley. A neutralist and pacifist, Hastings suffered various incidents on his arrival in India and was involved in three major wars against the Gurkhas, Pindaris and Marathas.

War with the Gurkhas (1814-1816 AD): Gurkha leader Prithvi Narayan established an independent Gurkha kingdom by ousting the ancient dynasty of Nepal. In 1792, Carpatrick was sent to Nepal as the company's ambassador when the English trade treaty was signed with the Gurkhas. But when he failed, in 1802, Captain Mocks was again sent to Nepal.

But as there was no definite boundary between Nepal and the British Empire, border disputes started between the two. Taking advantage of the neutrality of the English, the Gurkhas occupied two districts called Bhuttawal and Shishuraj, and war with the British became inevitable. Hastings declared war on Nepal in 1815 AD when they refused to return the two districts despite the request of the British government.

British troops were sent against Nepal through adverse natural conditions. With no chance of winning the war against the Gurkhas at first, General Ochterloni besieged Kathmandu, the capital of Nepal. As a result, the Gurkhas were forced to sign the Treaty of Sagauli. According to the terms of this treaty, the British annexed the border areas of Nepal, Shimla, Terai, Alsora etc. to the British Empire in North India. British suzerainty was also recognized in the state of Sikkim and a British Resident was appointed in Nepal. As a result of winning this battle, Hastings got the title of Marquis of Hastings.

Pindari War: The suppression of the Pindari bandits is one of the most important events of Lord Hastings' reign. Pindari bandits first appeared during the conflict between Aurangzeb and Shivaji. The Pindari bandits were composed of people of various castes and there was no religious distinction among them. Banditry was their only livelihood. They joined the Sindhia and Holkar's army from time to time and after the war they again went around as bandits. They looted in different parts of India especially in Matlab, Narmada Valley, Gujarat, Berar etc. and disturbed the public life.

As a result of the neutral policy of the British Government, Pindari Sardar Amir Khan Chitu, Karim Khan etc. increased the strength of their respective factions and became very dangerous for the British Government by raiding different parts of India.

In 1815 AD, they looted the Nizam's kingdom and destroyed the villages of North India and turned them into crematoriums. Hastings was determined to exact punishment for the insolence of the Pindaris. He secretly besieged the Pindari secret center of Malab from all sides, killing the Pindari and capturing many Pindari bandits. Their leader Karim Khan surrendered. Cheetah escaped into the jungle and was killed by a tiger. Then Amir Khan entered into an agreement with the British and took over the administration of a place called Tongku under Rajputana. In this way, Hastings established a permanent peace by suppressing the Pindaris who were creating terror in India.

Third Maratha War: After the Treaty of Besin, Peshwa II Bajirao realized his mistake and repented and tried to get rid of the British. He secretly negotiated with Scindia, Holkar and Bhosle to eliminate British rule from this country. The Peshwa soon increased his power under the influence of his minister Trimbakji. Disputes arose when Peshwa II Bazi also laid claim to Ahmedabad, which belonged to the Gaikwars. The Brahmin minister of Gaikwad was killed by an assassin when he returned under English guard in 1815 AD to settle the dispute. The British suspected the Peshwa of the death of Gaikwad's minister and imprisoned Trimbakji. But he managed to escape from there. The plight of Peshawar was revealed to British Resident Enphinstone

When the Peshawar conspiracy came to light, the British Resident forced him to conclude a new treaty in 1817 on the orders of Lord Hastings. It is known as Poona Sandhi. According to the terms of this treaty, the Peshwa was forced to surrender a part of his kingdom to the British. It was further recognized that he could not enter into an alliance with any Indian or foreign power without the permission of the British Resident. In the same year, Gaikwad signed a protective treaty with the British and left a portion of the kingdom for the maintenance of British troops.

Meanwhile, when Raghuji Bhosla of Nagpur state died, the succession conflict started there. When Raghuji's son Parmoji ascended the throne of Nagpur, his cousin Appa Saheb conspired with the British against Parmoji. In 1816, Appa Saheb entered into a subservient alliance with the British at the behest of Jenkis Saheb, the English Resident of Nagpur.

British Resident attacked by Peshwa: Peshwa's treaties with Bajirao II of Pune and Nagpur with Appa Saheb undermined Maratha influence and prestige. As a result, they became angry with the English. Unable to bear the insult, the Peshwa declared rebellion against the British and attacked the house of the British Resident. As a result, the third Anglo-Maratha war began. When the Peshwa was defeated in the battle of Kirki and fled, Appa Saheb and Holkar of Nagpur fought against the English. Appa Saheb was finally defeated and surrendered and Holkar was defeated and driven out. Gokhel, the commander of Peshawar, was defeated and killed in the last battle with the British. In 1819, the Peshwa was defeated in the battles of Amirgadh and Korgaard and surrendered to the British. This was the last chapter of the Anglo-Maratha war in India.

Result: As a result of the third Anglo-Maratha war, the Peshwa kingdom was included in the British Empire and the Peshwa was kept under British guard at a place called Vidhur near Kanpur in return for an allowance of 8 lakh rupees. A portion of the Peshwa's kingdom was given to a descendant of Shivaji. Appa Saheb was dethroned at Nagpur and Holkar was bound by a subservient alliance.

Establishment of British rule in Rajputana: One of the achievements of Lord Hastings was the establishment of British rule in Rajputana and Central India. In the 19th century, the Maratha invasions weakened the kingdoms of Rajputana. As a result, they become eager to gain allies. Realizing the military importance of the eloquent Hastings Rajput states, he tried to make them allies of the Company. Hastings could not forget the role of the Rajputs in suppressing the Pindari bandits. For that reason he was not at all willing to leave the Rajputs at the mercy of Sindhia and the Amir. He tactfully managed to establish direct relations with the Rajputs by forcing them to relinquish Sindhia's claims on the Rajput kingdoms. On the other hand, the Rajput rulers entered into a subservient alliance with the British to protect themselves from outside attacks. Thus in 1818 AD, Metcalf extended British sovereignty by concluding treaties with Udaipur and Jodhpur and the Rajput states agreed to the principle of not establishing friendship with other states without the permission of the British Resident. Thus British sovereignty was firmly established in Central India and the entire Rajputana.

Hastings' Reforms: Hastings gained prominence in Indian history for his diplomatic acumen and reforming work. He embarked on reforms to complete the unfinished business of Cornwallis. Cornwallis separated the judiciary from the administration. But Hastings abolished it and increased the power by increasing the number of Indian servants. He introduced the ryotwari land revenue system in Peshawar and Madras to protect the common people from the tyranny of the zamindars. As a patron of education, he was able to win the gratitude of the people of India by establishing Hindu College and Srirampur College in Calcutta. By his single-minded efforts to destroy the Maratha power and suppress the Pindari bandits, he made British sovereignty an unchallenged power in India. He resigned in 1823 and returned to his homeland.

Reasons for the fall of the Marathas: The rise and fall of the Marathas in India is a surprising phenomenon. At one time the Marathas resisted the Mughal advance with great vikram. After the fall of the Mughal Empire in the Indian subcontinent, the Marathas again created great obstacles in the expansion of the British empire. Later, due to lack of a competent leader, infighting arose between them and the Maratha power gradually weakened. The weakness of the Marathas paved the way for the expansion of British power in India. The reasons for their decline are discussed below:

First, the third battle of Panipat in 1761 AD dealt a heavy blow to the Marathas. As a result the Maratha power became weak fell and the unity of the Maratha confederacy was destroyed. Even if they later save energy, it is possible to return to the previous status didn't happen

Secondly, after the Third Battle of Panipat, various infighting and feuds arose among the Maratha chieftains. As a result, their decline is accelerated.

Thirdly, taking advantage of the infighting of the Marathas, the British interfered in their politics and bound most of the Maratha chieftains into subservient alliances. For example, to deal with the situation between Scindia and Holkar, the Treaty of Besin was concluded and the British got an opportunity to weaken their power.

Fourthly, the change in war policy of the Marathas was one of the reasons for their downfall. At one time they created panic and terror among the Mughals by adopting a guerilla warfare policy. The Marathas made a grave mistake by abandoning that policy of warfare and adopting the Western policy of warfare.

Fifthly, the Maratha system of governance was autocratic. They failed to gain the loyalty of the people in the conquered territories.

Sixth, the Maratha kingdom was generally founded on the personal talent and strength of the Maratha chieftains. Shivaji Maratha power and tradition remained intact during the rule of Baji Rao, Madhav Raj Nanafandavish. But after their death, the Maratha kingdom collapsed due to the absence of a strong leader.

Lord Amherst (1823-28 AD): John Allan, a senior member of the Calcutta Council, served as acting Governor General after Lord Hastings' return home. Then in 1823 AD, Lord Amherst arrived in India taking the office of Governor General. The notable events of his reign were the First Brahmo War, the capture of Bharatpur and the suppression of the sepoy mutiny at Barrackpore.

First Anglo-Brahman War (1824-34 AD): In 1750 AD, a Burmese chief named Ealampe established an independent kingdom in Brahmadesh. He united the two parts of Brahmadesh and proceeded towards Manipur and Shyam. Their relations with the British became bitter when his son Bodopaya captured Arakan in 1784 AD and Manipur in 1813 AD.

At that time, the British were in favor of maintaining peace with the Burmese as they were busy with wars in other parts of India. For this purpose, the British tried to maintain peace by sending English envoys to Brahmadesh six times. In the meantime, the Mugh residents of Arakan took refuge in English-occupied Chittagong due to the oppression and oppression of the Burmese. When Brahmaraj demanded the return of the fugitives, the British refused. As a result, Brahmaraj became angry with the company.

From 1786 to 1824, the Burmese attacked the British territories many times and inflicted heavy losses on them. The English authorities protested to Brahmaraj in this regard but to no avail. In addition, Bodopaya claimed Chittagong, Dhaka, Kasimbazar and Murshidabad as their territory to the British. But the British authorities contemptuously rejected such a claim of Brahmaraj.

In the latter part of the 18th century, when anarchy and disorder arose in the Ahom kingdom, at the request of the Ahom king Gaurnath Singh, Cornwallis sent a group of British soldiers under the command of Captain Wells to his aid. Captain Wells established peace in the Ahom kingdom and restored Gaurnath Singh to the throne. But with the return of the British commander Wells, the Burmese invaded Assam and occupied it.

After the conquest of Assam, the Burmese commander Bandula incited Brahmaraj against the British. According to his idea, it is possible to conquer Bangladesh by fighting against the British with a small army. War with the British became inevitable when the ambitious Burmese commander Bandula captured Shahpuri Island near Chittagong. When Lord Amherst was trying to negotiate with the Burmese government to settle the impending conflict, the Burmese forcibly abducted two English servants. As a result, Governor General Lord Amherst became impatient and he was forced to declare war against Brahmaraj in 1824 AD. At the beginning of the war, the Burmese defeated the British army in the Battle of Ramu. But the Burmese commander Bandula was defeated and killed by the English commander Campbell in the battlefield of Donabiur. Brahmaraj was forced to conclude the Treaty of Yandaboo with the English when Campbell Prom was captured. Under the terms of the Treaty of Yandaboo, Brahmaraj was forced to cede Assam, Cachar, Manipur, Arakan, Jayantika and Tenamarin to the British. In addition, the British received one crore rupees from Brahmaraj as compensation for the war. Thus ended the first IngaBrahma war.

Barrackpore Sepoy Mutiny (1824 AD): One of the most important events during Lord Amherst's reign was the Barrackpore Sepoy Mutiny. During the first Brahma war, when the Indian army was ordered to go to Brahmadesh, they disobeyed the order for religious reasons. Indian Hindus considered sea travel a great sin. The pay of the Indian army was very low compared to the European army. In addition, fearing defection, the Indian sepoys protested and declared mutiny. But Lord Amherst suppressed this rebellion with a strong hand.

Lord William Bentinck: Social and Educational Reforms

Lord William Bentinck arrived in India early in life and was appointed Governor of Madras Council. He was a peaceful and liberal ruler. During his reign (1803–07 AD) the Vellore Sepoy Mutiny broke out and when he failed to quell it, the British authorities ordered him to return home. Then after Lord Amherst's departure from India, in 1828, he came to India again as Governor General and held the position till 1835. He was respectful of the aspirations of the people of India. Hence, his reign is noted for various reforms rather than imperial expansion in India.

Bentinck's reforms:

Bentinck succeeded Lord Amherst as Governor General of British India. His reign is particularly memorable in the history of India for various reform works. Bentinck was one of the Governor Generals who ruled India earlier. Bentinck was the epitome of the Victorian era as a liberal, pacifist and pure reformer and free thinker. As a ruler, he believed that rulers had a moral responsibility to reflect the aspirations of the people of India. Based on this idea, he undertook many reformatory works in India. Bentinck's reforms can be roughly divided into four categories - economic reforms, governance reforms, social and educational reforms.

Economic reforms:

Cost Containment Policy: After the First World War, the financial problems of the company became evident. So Bentinck tried to solve the company's financial problems by taking over the administration. One of his reforms was restructuring the financial structure of the company. He rejected the austerity and war policy from the board of directors In order to reduce the company's military and civilian expenses, he fired many employees and reduced the salaries of other employees after receiving clear instructions. He abolished the practice of giving half allowance to military employees during peacetime. Besides, he introduced the system of gathering confidential information from the superiors about the performance and activities of the employees. As a result of the measures adopted by him, when discontent arose among the employees, he suppressed it. He abolished the provincial appellate courts of Cornwallis' reign and introduced a land survey system in Uttar Pradesh. He was able to increase the company's income by levying duties on opium produced in Malba, levying moderate taxes on waste land and by encroaching on ryotwari lands in the United Provinces and Madras. Through the economic reforms undertaken by him, he was able to meet the deficit of the company and earn a surplus of 15 lakh rupees annually

Administrative reforms

Judicial Reforms: Administrative reforms were a significant event of Bentinck's reign. He abolished the Provincial Courts introduced by Cornwallis and transferred criminal jurisdiction to District Collectors. He merged several to form one department and assigned the administrative responsibility of each department to the Divisional Commissioner. Earlier Indians were not appointed to any important posts. Lord Bentinck changed this rule under the Charter Act of 1833 AD and appointed Indians to important administrative and judicial posts based on merit. He earned the gratitude of the people of India by creating the post of sub-judges for Indian judges. From the beginning he entrusted the responsibility of administrative supervision of the Indian districts to the Divisional Commissioners. The headquarters of the Board of Revenue was shifted from Calcutta to Allahabad. In Indian courts, the native language began to be used instead of Persian. Bentinck also created another post of judge called 'Chief Sadr Amin' due to his administrative talent.

Introduction of Jury System: No ruler before Bentinck tried to legislate the existing rules or regulations regarding the governance of India. But under the Charter Act of 1833, Lord Meckley was appointed a law member in the Governor General's Council. Lord Bentinck constituted a Law Commission under his leadership and laid down the basis of the Indian Penal Code. Vincent Smith praised Bentinck's administrative skills and said, "Bentinck had the clear vision which enabled him to construct for the first time a really workable efficient framework of administration." Needless to say, he encouraged Indian participation in judicial proceedings by introducing the first jury system.

Social reform

Abolition of Satire: Lord Bentinck's contribution as a social reformer is undeniable. He is most famous in history for eradicating the infamous practice of 'Satidah' from Indian society. Since ancient times, the practice of 'sahmaran' (burning in the same pyre with the dead husband) and 'anumaran' (imitating the death of the husband in a pyre) has been prevalent in the Hindu society of this country. According to this custom, the relatives of the deceased used to burn the widow in the same pyre with her husband or in a foreign country in imitation of the dead husband in order to preserve social discipline and morals. Disturbed by this inhuman punishment, Bentinck abolished it in 1829. In this regard, Bentinck received the active support of two other Indian social reformers named Raja Rammohan Roy and Prince Dwarkanath Tagore.

Prohibition of infanticide: Apart from this, he also banned forever the practice of throwing the first child into the Ganga to appease the gods and strangulation of the infant girl due to her inability to marry. It was also banned during the reign of Emperor Akbar, Lord Cornwallis and Lord Minto but its effectiveness could not be stopped. So Lord Bentinck not only banned this infamous practice, he passed a law against it and provided severe punishment to the violators. As a result, it is canceled forever.

Thug Daman: He then focused on the infamous thugs who terrorized India. During the fall of the Mughals, these thug bandits appeared who created terror. They made a living by conducting banditry through looting, torture and brutal killings all over India. They used to mingle with passers-by in disguise and when they got the chance they would kill them and loot everything they could and run away. When public life was disrupted by the tyranny of thugs, Bentinck was determined to remedy it. He assigned the responsibility of suppressing thugs to an employee named Colonel Sleeman.

Sleeman's achievement: Colonel Sleeman captured a rogue chief called Beringia after many searches. From him he discovered the hideouts of the thugs and led a surprise attack brutally killing about one and a half thousand thugs and capturing many. Thus when the public was saved from the tyranny and oppression of the thug bandits, Lord Bentinck was bound in gratitude and gave him rapturous praise.

Education reform

Introduction of Western Education System: The spread of Western education was one of the greatest achievements of Lord Bentinck's reign. Sanskrit and Persian languages have been prevalent in India since long ago. By a charter of 1813 AD the Company was authorized to spend one lakh rupees annually for the spread of education among Indians. But this money was usually spent on teaching the traditional Sanskrit and Persian languages. In 1833, when Bentinck thought of teaching the English language, two groups were formed in the subcontinent. A group was in favor of teaching in Eastern languages, i.e. traditional Sanskrit and Persian languages. The supporter of this party was Sanskrit scholar Wilson. On the other hand, the legal affairs member of the Governor General's Council, Lord Meckley, and Raja Rammohan Roy, one of the leaders of Indian social reform, expressed their views in support of the introduction of Western education. Bentinck finally recognized the importance of Western education when the mass movement around education began and provided large sums of money for English language education. Due to his efforts, the Medical College in Calcutta and the Elphinstone Institution in Bombay were established in 1835 AD. As a result of his singular efforts, the barrier of English education between the East and the West was quickly removed and helped the Indian to achieve mental excellence.

Foreign policy

Change in Foreign Policy: Lord Bentinck followed a policy of total neutrality towards foreign states. However, exceptions are observed in some cases. His liberal and neutral policy towards foreign states forced him to intervene when internal disturbances broke out in the states of Gwalior, Jaipur, Bhupal and Baroda. Changes in his foreign policy were also observed in the Jaintias of Coorg, Mysore, Cachar and Assam. After the death of the king of Cachar state, as he had no rightful heir, Bentinck brought Cachar state under British rule on public demand. Again, he annexed the Coorg state to the British Empire on charges of misrule and tyranny. Bentinck brought Jaintia under his rule when some Englishmen fell victim to their brutal policies (abducted for human sacrifice) in the Jaintia state of Assam.

He also brought the state of Mysore under the company's rule on charges of anarchy. During Bentinck's reign, the fear of a Russian invasion made him uneasy. At this time, the Russians, after establishing dominance in Central Asia, came close to the north-west border and sent Ranjit Singh to the court. Through his mediation, the Maharaja of Punjab met with Ranjit Singh at a place called 'Rupar'. At this time, the Board of Control, Alexander Barnes, a famous English diplomat, was secured by Maharaja Bentinck's 'Perpetual Alliance', along with many gifts, and the North-West Frontier was secured. Bentinck's alliance with the Amirs of Sindh was established when the British got trade opportunities from Ranjit Singh along the Indus and Shatadru rivers.

Charter dated 1833 AD

Charter Act of 1833: In 1813, the British government granted commercial charters to the East India Company. This charter gave the company exclusive commercial rights and privileges in the subcontinent. But when the charter period expired in 1831, Lord William Bentinck petitioned the British Parliament to extend the charter period. On the other hand, the progressive British public called for an end to the Company's misrule in the Indian subcontinent and to bring India under direct royal control. At the very moment when the British public was vocal in the movement against the company's rule, the British Parliament reformed the company's charter by extending it for another 20 years, making the company directly under the control of the Parliament. As this Act was passed in 1833 AD, it is known as the 'Charter Act' of 1833 AD. According to the charter of 1833 AD, the subcontinent's administrative history changed. Its main main stream was

As follows:

1. The Act curtailed the commercial rights of the East India Company in the Indian subcontinent and China and empowered the Company to exercise political functions only in India.

1. By this charter the company was freed from the control of the board of directors and temporarily under the control of the Parliament

3. The Chairman of the Board of Control was appointed as the Minister of Indian Affairs.

4. By this Act, the Governor General of Bengal was conferred the title of 'Governor General' of India and got the power to pass laws necessary for the governance of the entire subcontinent.

5. By this Act the full authority of the Company was vested in the Governor General.

6. Lord Meckley was appointed a Law Member to advise the Governor General on legal matters. 7. The Governorships of Madras and Bombay Presidencies were placed under the control of the Governor General. In this law, the Indian people get the right to be appointed to higher positions in government jobs on the basis of merit.

Sir Charles or Metcalf (1835 AD)

Lord Bentinck resigned after ruling for seven long years and in 1835 Sir Charles Metcalfe was appointed as the temporary Governor General of the subcontinent. He ruled India for only one year. A notable event during his reign was the granting of freedom to the Indian press. In this regard, he was displeased with the British government. He resigned in 1836 when the British government severely criticized his liberal policies and Lord Auckland was appointed Governor General of the Indian subcontinent.

Lord Auckland (1836-42 AD)

In 1836, Lord Auckland was appointed Governor General of the Indian subcontinent after Sir Charles Metcalf. He took over the rule of British India and did many reform works. He tried to gain popularity by doing public good. That is why he tried to achieve excellence in education by reforming agriculture and the education system. Earlier there was a tradition of giving scholarships only to English language students. Auckland abolished the system and introduced a scholarship system for students of Arabic, Persian languages. He ensured religious freedom for all by abolishing government obligations on religious ceremonies. Despite adopting a liberal and neutral policy in governing the country, he soon became afraid of the Russian attack and created bitterness by interfering in the politics of the native princes.

His Afghan Policy: The notable event of Lord Auckland's reign was his failed Afghan policy. Fearing a Russian invasion, his policy towards Afghanistan shows his extreme inaction and short-sightedness.

by doing

Sending trade missions to Afghanistan: British Foreign Secretary Palmerston instructed Auckland to keep a watchful eye on Afghanistan as Russia focused on expanding its empire in Central Asia. Then in 1837 AD, when Persia attacked Heart in the middle of Afghanistan at the instigation of Russia, Auckland became afraid and scared about the border. He sent a trade mission to Afghanistan under the command of Captain Barnes on the instructions of the English authorities to maintain goodwill with Afghanistan. The purpose of this mission was to keep the Amir of Afghanistan away from contact with Russia.

Causes of Afghan War: When the British trade mission arrived in Afghanistan, Amir Dost Muhammad welcomed them and accepted the captain's offer of alliance. But in return he demanded the return of Peshawar occupied by Ranjit Singh to the British. It was not possible for Auckland to agree to this proposal as Ranjit Singh was an ally of the British. As a result, Amir Dost Muhammad was forced to invite the Russian trade mission. Auckland became angry with him and adopted a plan to remove Dost Muhammad by force and tried to increase British influence in Afghanistan by giving the throne of Kabul to Shah Shuja, the former emir of Afghanistan, a British protectorate.

Conquest of Kabul by Combined Forces: Lord Auckland then entered into the Tripower Pact with Souza and Ranjit Singh and marched towards Afghanistan with a combined force. They defeated and dethroned Dost Muhammad and occupied Kandahar, Ghazni and Kabul. Dost Muhammad was helpless and surrendered to the combined forces. They placed Shah Shuja on the throne of Kabul and transferred Dost Muhammad to Calcutta. The freedom-loving Afghan nation could not easily accept the unjust intervention of the British government in Afghanistan and the forced imposition of an unpopular government. The Afghans, enraged by the actions of the British and the misbehavior of Captain Barnes, declared open mutiny and ambushed and killed Barnes, the captain of the English force. The British Resident at Kabul entered into a humiliating treaty with them after the miserable defeat of the British forces. According to the terms of the treaty, the British immediately left Afghanistan and released Dost Muhammad. But the Afghans doubted the integrity of British Resident McNaughten and finally killed him too. After that, the British made another treaty with the Afghans. According to the terms of this treaty, the army was accepted to hand over all weapons to the Afghans and leave the country unarmed. During the retreat, the Afghans suddenly opened fire from the rear and routed the entire British force.An Englishman named Dr.Brown somehow reached Jalalabad through very miserable conditions. Lord Auckland immediately resigned on news of the deplorable condition of the British forces. Then after the shortsighted Auckland, Lord Ellenborough was appointed Governor General of India.

Lord Ellenborough (1842-44 AD)

Due to the failure of the Afghan policy, Lord Auckland resigned in 1842 and returned home, and Lord Ellenborough was appointed as the Governor General of India. After assuming power, he was determined to wipe away the gloom of British failure by establishing British rule in Afghanistan.

Generals Pollock and Natten against the Afghans: Lord Ellenborough sent Generals Pollock and Natten against Afghanistan to punish the rebellious Afghans. They easily occupied Kabul and destroyed a bazaar at the mouth of the cannon. Shah Shuja was previously killed by Afghan insurgents.

Although the conquest of Afghanistan was possible, the British were forced to leave the country due to adverse natural conditions and released Dost Muhammad unconditionally. Dost Muhammad again got the post of Amir of Kabul. Thus ended the Afghan war.

Conquest of Indus (1823 AD)

Treaty signing with the Amirs of Sindh: Lord Ellenbora's conquest of Indus is one of the most scandalous events in the history of the Indian subcontinent. The British had good relations with the Amirs of Sindh since long ago. Although the Amirs originally claimed allegiance to Afghanistan, they actually ruled independently. Lord Minto maintained good relations with the Amirs of Sindh by signing a treaty of alliance in 1809 AD to prevent the spread of French influence and prestige in the country of Sindh. This treaty was re-signed in 1820 AD. The reformist Bentinck signed an agreement with the Amir of Hyderabad in 1832 AD for commercial trade on the Indus water and land routes. The treaty stipulated that the British would be able to move freely through Sindh for trade. However, no ammunition or weapons can be carried. Lord Auckland, realizing the importance of having a British Resident at the court of Hyderabad, signed the treaty with the Amir.

Auckland's attitude towards the Amirs: When the first Anglo-Afghan war broke out in 1837, Auckland disregarded the peace treaty signed with the Amirs of Sindh and freely sent ammunition and weapons to Afghanistan. In addition, he extorted money from the Amirs of Sindh to meet the expenses of the war. As a result, the Amirs were waiting for an opportunity to take revenge. The Amirs could have harmed the British on their way home after the failed campaign in Afghanistan if they wished.

But they were not ready to do this inhuman act. Despite this, the level of unnecessary anger of the British towards the Amirs did not decrease a bit.

Defeat of the Amirs: Lord Ellenborough was a terrorist ruler. After taking over the rulership, he continued to incite the Amirs in various ways to conquer the country of Sindh. Despite this, the Amirs of Sindh did not take any kind of enmity or retaliatory measures against the British. Ellenbora accused them of treason and sent Commander Napier to Sind. Napier annexed part of Sindh to the British Empire by forcing the Amirs to sign a humiliating treaty. The British commander Napier along with them abolished the coinage of the Amirs in their own names for extreme misbehavior. Then, when Napier captured the fort of Imamgarh in Sindh, the Baluchs of Sindh, disoriented by anger and grief, declared rebellion. When they ambushed the British Embassy, the British declared war on them. In 1843 AD, the Amirs of Sindh were completely defeated in the battlefields of Miani and Dabo, and Sindh became part of the British Empire.

Criticism: Lord Ellenborough's Sindh policy and Napier's haughty behavior have been criticized by historians. There is no doubt that it is a grave crime to take away the political freedom of an independent state allied to the British. Napier admits that British behavior in Sindh was not morally justifiable. According to him, "We have no right to seize Sind, yet we shall do so".

Battle of Gwalior

Capture of Gwalior: The capture of Gwalior by the British is another significant event of Lord Ellenbora's reign. When Maharaja Janakji died childless, the state of Gwalior became anarchy. In this situation, Scindia's army declared rebellion and seized political power. At that time, the Sikhs declared rebellion and started a war against the British. He sent a large force under Sir Humus to prevent Sindhia's rebel army from joining the Sikhs. The British forces defeated Sindhia's rebel forces in the battles of Maharajpur and Pania and occupied Gwalior. Then Elenora Scindia's widow Tarabai's pet son was placed on the throne and brought Gwalior under British rule.

Lord Ellenborough's reign is particularly important in the history of British India for its reformative work. He passed laws abolishing slavery and banning anti-social lottery games. He created the post of Deputy Magistrate and arranged for the appointment of Indians on the basis of merit. Reforming the police system introduced by Lord Cornwallis, he increased the allowances and promoted constables. Then he resigned and returned home in 1844 on the order of the Parliament.

Lord Hardinge (1845-48 AD)

After Lord Ellenborough, Lord Hardinge was appointed Governor General of India in 1845 AD. He was a peaceful ruler. His reign is a glorious place in the history of British India for various reforms occupied

Lord Bentinck was able to stop the practice of sati immolation in British territories. Lord Hardinge extended it widely and declared the practice of this abominable practice in the native states and the banning of infanticide. He was the only person among the British rulers who realized the importance of improving the Indian public transport system and took up the first plan to build railway lines in India. It was through his efforts that extensive programs of digging canals in the Ganges and spreading education were undertaken. He occupies a permanent place in history by outlawing and abolishing the custom of narbali practiced among the hill tribes of Orissa. Although his political objective was to bring prosperity to the country through peace and order, he got involved in the first Sikh war while facing the pressure and circumstances of nature.

First Sikh War (1845-46 AD):The British had good relations with Maharaja Ranjit Singh. But after his death, succession conflict arose in the Sikh kingdom. In 1843 AD Ranjit Singh's infant son Dilip Singh ascended the throne with the help of the army and his mother Maharani Jhindan was appointed as his guardian. At this time the suspicious activities of the British disturbed the Sikhs and Maharani Jindan ordered the Sikhs to take defensive measures against the British on the banks of the Shatadru when they took up the program of building a bridge across the Shatadru river in the Bombay region. Sikhs do not tolerate such activities. Pere Lord Hardinge declared war against the Sikhs in 1845 AD. Then the Sikhs were miserably defeated by the British in the battles of Mudki, Ferozshah, Aliwal Ora. The British captured Lahore after winning four consecutive battles. In this situation the Sikhs were forced to make a treaty with the British. According to the terms of the treaty, they were forced to cede Jalandhar, Doab and the southern territory of Shatadru between Bipasha and Shatdru to the British. In addition, the Sikhs agreed to pay one crore rupees to the British as war reparations. But as the Sikh treasury was empty, the British sold Jammu and Kashmir to the Jammu Dogra leader for 75 lakh rupees. Apart from this, the British appointed a British resident in Lahore and brought Dilip Singh directly under British rule. Thus the British are British in Lahore able to establish dominance.

Lord Dalhousie (1846-56 AD)

After Lord Hardinge, Lord Dalhousie was appointed Governor General of India at the age of thirty six. In personal life he was an arbitrary, hardworking and ambitious ruler. Wellesley is the only one of the imperial rulers sent by the English authorities to the Indian subcontinent. However, behind Lord Wellesley's policy of imperial expansion was his fear of France, but in that case Lord Dalhousie was a fierce imperialist. The main objective of his imperialist policy was the massive expansion of the British Empire in the subcontinent. In this context, Dr. Majumdar said, "Lord Dalhousie's reign is notable for the overthrow of many Indian states and the expansion of the British Empire." He implements his imperialist principles mainly in three ways. Namely- (1) State expansion by direct war, (2) State expansion by applying the principle of dispossession and (3) extra-state rights on the pretext of misrule.

Kingdom expansion by direct warfare

Lord Dalhousie's achievements as one of the patrons of imperialist policy are the Sikh kingdom of Punjab and the Pegu rights of Assam. That's why he had to adopt the direct war policy and enter the Second Sikh War and the Second Brahma War. Both these wars are a shining example of his radical imperialist policy.

Causes of Sikh Revolt: The Sikhs could not forget the failure and defeat of the generals of the First Sikh War. In addition, Lord Hardinge's measures in governing the Punjab further agitated the Sikhs. At that time the ruler of Punjab was Diwan Mulraj. He did not like the interference of the British Resident in matters of governance. The situation worsened when the British Resident at Lahore ordered him to submit an income-expenditure account. Mulraj was then forced to submit his resignation. The British government accepted the resignation of Moolaraj and decided to appoint a new governor of Multan. A large force was then sent under the British Resident at Lahore, Vance New and Anderson, to replace the newly appointed ruler of Multan.

Dalhousie Declaration of War: On the arrival of the newly appointed rulers in Multan, Mulraj declared mutiny, pounced on them and killed two British servants to re-establish his supremacy in Multan. • The Sikhs of Punjab were waiting for an opportunity to take revenge. So fortunately the Sikhs and Afghans united with the Moolaraj and declared rebellion against the British Government. Realizing the dire gravity of the situation, Lord Dalhousie declared war against them. It is known in History as the Second Sikh War.

Defeat of the British Commander: Lord Dalhousie sent two large forces under Commander Edwards and Lord Gough to suppress the rebels. Commander Edwards defeated the rebels in two successive battles and besieged Diwan Mulraj in the fort of Multan. On the other hand, the army led by Lord Gough was miserably defeated by the Sikh general Sher Singh at the Battle of Chillianwala on the banks of the Jhelum River.

Suppression of Mutiny by Commander Napier: Lord Dalhousie was greatly disturbed by the defeat of the English forces. He then removed the commander Lord Gough and quickly sent Charles Napier in his place. Charles Napier was a ruthless and skillful general in that era. He upheld the glory of the British nation by winning several wars in India. General Napier defeated the combined Sikh forces in the battlefield of Gujarat on the banks of the Chenab river and drove them back to the Afghan border.

Dalhousie made a declaration and dethroned Dilip Singh by annexing Punjab to the British Empire.

Result of the war: As a result of the victory in this war, the boundaries of the British Empire extended to the borders of Afghanistan. Chhatra Singh and Sher Singh were forced to surrender to the British. An annual allowance of 50 thousand pounds was adopted to Dilip Singh. A Chief Commissioner was appointed to govern the Punjab. Under the liberal and just rule of the British, the Sikh nation soon became loyal servants and the proof of their loyalty was reflected in the subsequent Brahmo War and the suppression of the Sepoy Mutiny.

Second Brahma War (1835 AD)

Causes of Second Brahma War: Trade disputes during Dalhousie's reign led to the outbreak of Second Brahma War. After the first Brahmo War in 1826, British relations with the Burmese were hostile. Gradually their relationship deteriorated to such an extent that in 1840 AD Brahmaraj expelled the British Resident from Ava. In 1851 AD, some high-ranking British officials who were insulted and assaulted by the Burmese demanded compensation from Lord Dalhousie along with suitable remedies. Dalhousie then sent Admiral Commodore Lambert with a large warship to Brahmadesh to collect compensation. Brahmaraj was not in favor of this unnecessary war. So he deposed the governor of Rangoon on charges of misbehavior to appease the British government. But Admiral Lambert was not satisfied with this and took possession of one of Brahmaraj's warships. Lambert's behavior made the second Anglo-Brahman war inevitable. Condemning Lambert's behavior, Dalhousie said, "These commodores are too combustible for negotiations." Commodore was very excited about the deal." However, when the Burmese started firing on Lambert's ship, the Second Brahma War began.

Capture of Pegu: Lord Dalhousie sends a large force under General Godwin to Lambert's aid. He soon captured Rangoon, Prome and Pegu. A declaration by Lord Dalhousie when Brahmaraja refused to sign the treaty Rode annexed the British Empire. Thus, British rule was established in the entire coastal region of the Bay of Bengal.

Occupy of Sikkim: Lord Dalhousie annexed the state of Sikkim to the British Empire in 1849 AD due to mistreatment of British servants. Dr. Campbell and Dr. When the Sikkim Raj imprisoned and harassed two English high-ranking officials named Hooker, Dalhousie took this punitive action against the Sikkim state.

Ownership policy

Nature of Imperialist Policy: Lord Dalhousie was an ardent imperialist. The main objective of his imperialist policy was the massive expansion of the British Empire in India. Inspired by this purpose, one of the methods he followed was his famous principle of abolition of property. Dalhousie effectively applied this policy. The principle of expropriation was that if the king of a British protectorate died childless and left no heirs to his dynasty, that state would directly belong to the British Empire and the rights of adopted or foster sons would not be recognised. According to ancient Hindu custom, the adoption of adopted sons was recognized by the Company to preserve the kingdom of a sonless king or dynasty. But Lord Dalhousie rejected the claim of native states to adopt sons by the principle that it was directly British Incorporated into the empire.

Application of this principle: Lord Dalhousie widely applied the principle of abolition of property, but he was not its inventor. This policy was formulated earlier.

As a result of Wellesley's adoption of the Subsidiary Alliance policy, when the native states lost their political independence and became dependent on the British, the field of application of the abolition policy was greatly expanded. Dalhousie expanded the British Empire by conquering one kingdom after another. Applying the policy of dispossession, he occupied the following states.

By this policy, Sutra, Nagpur, Sambalpur came under British possession.

Dalhousie, the epitome of imperialism, was the first to apply disenfranchisement to swimmers. Swimmer King was adopted without British permission. After the king's death in 1848 AD, Dalhousie overruled the claim of his adopted son and annexed the empire. Then the king of Sambalpur died childless and Dalhousie Sambalpur was British

Included in the state.

The rights of Bhagat, Udaipur and Karauli were weakened: Then in 1853 AD when the Bhosle Raja of Nagpur died childless, Dalhousie turned his attention to it. However, although there is doubt whether Nagpur is a state created by the British, Dalhousie annexed it considering its political importance. When the King of Jhansi died childless in 1850 AD, Jhansi became part of the British Empire. In this way, Dalhousie added states like Bhagat, Udaipur and Karauli to the British Empire. However, the application of dispossession policy on Karauli was declared illegal by the English authorities Dalhousie returned it.

Capture of Karnataka and Tanjore: Following the policy of abolition, Dalhousie stopped the allowances and stipends of the Nawab of Karnata and the king of Tanjore and the royal family. Then after the death of Peshwa Bazi Rao II, his adopted son Dhundu Panther and Nanasaheb stopped the scholarship and annexed these states to the British Empire.

Ayodhya consumed on the pretext of misrule: Dalhousie's different method of imperial expansion is to consume the native kingdom on the pretext of misrule. He applied it to the kingdom of Ayodhya. The Nawab of Ayodhya became a 'powerful and magnificent void' by the application of subservient alliances. Although the responsibility of governance was entrusted to the Nawab, the real power was in the hands of the British, resulting in deadlock in the governance of the state. Therefore, the imperialist Dalhousie dethroned Nawab Waje Ali of Ayodhya on the charge of misrule and annexed the state of Ayodhya to the British Empire. Unable to pay the promised sums of money to bear the expenses of the British troops as per the policy of subservient alliance, Dalhousie annexed the province of Berar from the Nizam of Hyderabad by a proclamation.

Dalhousie's Regime: Dalhousie was one of the few rulers who arrived in the Indian subcontinent from the beginning of British rule. Among British rulers, he was a man of strong personality and his organizational skills were very admirable. English historian Sir Richard Temple said about him, "Of all the illustrious men sent by the English authorities to rule this country, none could surpass Dalhousie. His eight-year rule in India ushered in a new era that greatly influenced the history of the subcontinent. That is why he is called the father of modern India.

Dalhousie was not only an imperial ruler – he was also a great ruler. Due to his extraordinary work force, he improved all sections of India's administrative progress. Through his progressive thinking, he worked hard to make backward Indians the pioneers of western education and civilization. It is undeniable that his ideals were great in the internal governance of the Indian subcontinent.

It is true that he greatly expanded the British Empire in India by his expansion of imperialist policies and wars. But at the same time he brought about multifaceted development of India through his internal reform work. It was from his time that the foundation of the state unity of modern India was laid in the subcontinent. Arranged the exchange of letters in different parts of India through Indian railway lines, telegraph and postage stamps. With the introduction of railways, Dalhousie facilitated communication to remote parts of India. Commenting on Dalhousie's achievements, historian Smith said, "Whatever his faults may be, Lord Dalhousie may be ranked with the likes of Warren Hastings Wellesley and Lord Hentinck among the first class of Governor-Generals." One of the achievements of his administrative skills was the appointment of a Lieutenant Governor or Chhotlat to rule Bangladesh. This reduced the workload of the Governor General somewhat. Similarly, he adopted a different administrative system for Punjab and Pegu Province in Burma, which he attributed to his skillful governance and departmental training of district civil servants. carries identity. Dalhousie divided the whole of India into a number of districts to introduce fair governance in the Indian subcontinent

Lord Dalhousie played a commendable role in social reforms. Before his arrival, widow marriage was completely prohibited in Indian Hindu society. But Lord Dalhousie (Widow Remarriage Act) passed the Widow Remarriage Act and introduced the practice of remarriage of Hindu widows. Ishwarchandra Vidyasagar helped him a lot in the practice of widow marriage. by passing a law, he gave the converted Indians the right to enjoy their ancestral property. Lord Dalhousie's philanthropic activities are particularly notable among his various reform works. He established the Public Works Department for roads, sewers and excavations in various parts of India. During his tenure, India's longest road 'Grand Trunk Road' from Calcutta to Peshawar was renovated. Dalhousie played a very important role in the development of India's communication system.

Western education

Lord Dalhousie realized the need for the education of Indians and concentrated on spreading western education. Charles Wood, the President of the Board of Control, helped him in this matter to spread English education in India. Mr. Wood's educational plan greatly helped in laying the foundations of education in modern India. Schools, colleges and universities were established in different parts of the country under his instructions. The system of giving government grants to private educational institutions established by the public was introduced under his instructions. Bethune College was established in Calcutta under the patronage of Lord Dalhousie and the efforts of Bethune Sahib. Under the guidance of Mr. Wood, in 1854, the guidelines for education were prepared. Under this direction, Dalhousie created the Department of Public Education and established schools, colleges and universities in different regions. He arranged for government grants to private schools and colleges. Bethune Sahib, a member of the council, established the Bethune Mahila College in Calcutta for the extension of women's education alone.

To speed up communication in the subcontinent, he introduced railways and built new railway lines up to the North-West Frontier. He modernized India's communication system by introducing the telegram system

Ultimately, Clive laid the foundations of the British Empire in India. Wellesley tried to establish English rule in India. But Lord Dalhousie was able to establish English power as the only unchallenged power in India. Therefore, Lord Dalhousie's contribution to Indianization of the British administrative system cannot be denied in any way.

Credit to Dalhousie

Introduction of Technology: Lord Dalhousie was one of the Governor Generals sent by England authorities to rule the Indian subcontinent. Although he is characterized as an imperial ruler, his contribution to statecraft and social reforms is undeniable. Richard Temple said of his administrative prowess, "He was surpassed by none of the rulers sent by England, and had few equals." According to Lord Curzon, "His fame was second only to that of Warren Hastings. His qualities as a ruler were all the more famous for his achievements in the expansion of empires in the Indian subcontinent."

Administrative Reforms: Lord Dalhousie appointed a Lieutenant Governor or Chhota Lat for Bangladesh by introducing administrative reforms to ensure good governance in the country. He established the Central Governing Council in Punjab and Pegu by introducing good governance. He increased the powers of the magistrates by dividing the provinces into districts to streamline the administration on the basis of efficiency. In addition, he introduced the practice of merit-based promotion of civil servants through departmental examinations. He also made necessary reforms in the military department. So that the Bengali soldiers could not revolt, he shifted them from Calcutta to Meerut. Dalhousie formed a strong regiment of Punjabis and Gurkhas. A notable event of his reign was the improvement of the communication system. He brought revolutionary changes in the development of trade and commerce by building railways in the subcontinent and improving the post office and its departments.

Social Reforms: Lord Dalhousie also played a significant role in social reforms. There was no custom of remarriage of Hindu widows to prevent sati-immolation. With the help of Dalhousie scholar Ishwarchandra Vidyasagar, Hindu widows were well-off. Hindu widow marriage was introduced by passing the Marriage Act. He established the Works Department and arranged for the construction and repair of roads, bridges. During his time the construction of the longest Grand Trunk Road was completed and the digging of the famous Ganges Canal Charter Act (1853): In 1853 the East India Company received its last charter. They arranged for the appointment of Indians to high government posts through competitive examinations. According to this charter, Indians first got the right to be appointed to high posts. The position of Lieutenant Governor or Chhotalat created in the Bangladesh regime is recognized as Sanad.

Finally it can be said that he was one of the greatest rulers of British power in the subcontinent. A conqueror, builder and was responsible for the Great Rebellion. His contribution as a reformer is undeniable. However, due to radical imperialist policies, he disregarded the ancient Hindu customs and Indian public opinion and gained the respect of the people by annexing state after state to the British Empire, which in 1857 AD

Role of Anti-Company Rule Movement: After the Battle of Palashi, a great change was observed in the political field of Bengal as well as the whole of India. The British Empire was built on the ruins of the Mughal Empire, which had been in power for over two hundred years. With the political changes in the country, massive changes in governance and social system started. The widespread application of imperialist policies and changes in the governance system for the expansion of the British Empire in India created adverse reactions in the minds of the people of India. Not only that, the anger of the people of India against the British rule was increasing day by day due to political, economic, administrative, religious etc. The accumulated anger of the Indian people at the torture and oppression of the British government finally paved the way for the Great Revolt of 1857. Since the beginning of the English rule, these native kings-maharaj etc. Anti-British sentiments began to fester among the common people, educated, uneducated military civil servants and sepoys, and eventually led to fragmented rebellions in various parts of India. Notable among these rebellions are the Fakir-Sannyasi Rebellion, the Rangpur Rebellion, the Faraji and Wahhabi Rebellions and the Santal Rebellion.

Anti-English movement

Revolt of Fakirs and Monks (1760 - 1800 AD): One of the early revolts against British rule was the Sanyasi Revolt. The rebel monks were fearless and belonged to the Giri sect. During the reign of Emperor Akbar, these monks were identified as a special military group. The illustrious activity of the Sannyas was observed fighting on behalf of Ahmad Shah Abdali against the Marathas. About five thousand monks fought on behalf of Mir Qasim against the British in the Battle of Buxar. Similarly in Bangladesh In the early days of its rule, the East India Company had to deal with a strong monastic rebellion. There is no doubt that the anti-British sentiments in the subcontinent led to these two separate groups, the Hindu monks and the Muslim fakirs, of British rule.Became a rebel against oppression. As a result they are oppressed peasant communities, dispossessed landlords and gained the support of the soldiers. Taking advantage of the anarchy and chaos in the Company's rule, the Naga monks in various parts of India continued to ambush the Company's employees and commit murders and loot. As they had no fixed place of abode, they wandered in different regions in the guise of saints. After the great famine of Bengal in the 1970s, their fortunes gradually increased. Bengal's poor peasants, dispossessed landlords and dispossessed soldiers joined them. The brokers and officials of the company in Malda, Dinajpur, Rangpur, Bogra and Dhaka districts were always terrified by the constant attacks of the monks. In 1772, the rebel monks defeated the English sepoys in a battle at Rangpur and killed Captain Thomas. After defeating the government army, the rebel monks were elated with victory and with great fanfare they started attacking different parts of Bangladesh.

Towards the end of the Mughal rule, a large number of fakirs and monks from different parts of India settled in Mymensingh and North Bengal. Most of them belonged to the Madari community and they used to travel in groups to Dargahs and religious places in addition to agriculture. After the Battle of Palashi in 1758, the English East India Company levied various taxes on monks and fakirs for pilgrimages and rituals. From 1758 to 1763, the powerless Nawab of Murshidabad, the common peasants, artisans and fakir monks were subjected to the exploitation and oppression of the Company-imposed dualism. According to the English writer Reginald Rendon, the company's mismanagement destroyed Dhaka's world-famous muslin industry and forced one-third of its workers to take shelter in the jungles.

Peasant Revolt: Peasants, laborers and artisans in the north turned anti-British against the endless tyrannical rule and exploitation of the East India Company. Under the misrule of Governor General Warren Hastings, they rebelled against Company rule. Lord Warren Hastings called the farmers' revolt an 'invasion of Bangladesh by fakir monks' and launched a campaign against them. As a result, the rebel fakirs and monks organized into armed groups and attacked the English merchants, native landlords and rich people and caused great damage. According to William Hunter, the unemployed and underprivileged soldiers of the ruined Mughal Empire, encouraged by the rebellion of fakir-monks and peasants, participated in the anti-British struggle. These Fakirs were Majnushah, Musashah, Balaqi Shah, Cheragh Ali-Shah, Sobhan Shah, Karim Shah, Nurul Mohammad. Leaders like Bhabani Pathak, Devi Chaudhurani etc. led the rebellion.

Struggle against the English Company: In 1760, the monks first started a struggle against the British in Burdwan district and looted and captured the British kuthi in Bakerganj and Dhaka districts. Then in 1763, the rebels looted the English kuthi of Boalia at Sampur in Rajshahi district and killed the director of the kuthi, Renet Sahib.

In 1766, the rebel forces defeated the British army led by Captain Rennett and Morison in Cooch Behar.

Dinhata occupied the area. Then in 1767 the rebels attacked the British army at Patna and in December 1769 they destroyed the British forces led by General Keith in the Morang region on the Nepal border.

Commander Keith was killed in the battle. During the Great Famine of 1770 or Manvantara of Seventy-Six, many of the unfortunate peasants of this country joined the anti-British struggle with the rebel fakir-monks. As a result, in 1770-1772, the whole of Bengal and Bihar became the battlefield of a great rebellion.

Central Movement in Patna and North Bengal: In 1770-71, Fakir Majnushah started a larger movement in Rangpur, Dinajpur districts centered on Mahasthangarh in Patna and North Bengal. Then Rangpur became the main workplace of Fakir rebels from 1773 onwards. From here they started looting the Nilkuthis of the tyrannical zamindars of Rangpur and Dinajpur districts, the Kacharis and the English. In 1772, when the English commander Thomas led an army against the rebels in order to punish them, he was killed by the rebels in Shyampur near Rangpur district. Thus 1773 Captain Edward Dalbal was killed in a battle with the rebels in Madhupur forest of Mymensingh district. Amit Vikramashali Fakir Majnushah was wounded with the British at Baleshwar in Bogra District on 29 December 1786 and died later in 1787. Even after the death of Fakir Majnushah, the uncompromising leader of the Fakir monks, his army disciples continued this rebellion till 1800.

Fakir Rebellion under the leadership of Balaki Shah: The Fakirs of Salimabad, Chandradwip and Shujabad Parganas of Bakerganj district started an anti-British movement under the leadership of Balaqi Shah. In 1791 Balaki Shah carried out an expedition and imprisoned many tyrannical zamindars, talukdars and leaseholders. He established a market there called Shah Bandar and built a mud square. Then he declared independence in 1791 by equipping his five thousand followers with modern military equipment. Balaqi Shah was defeated and captured in a battle with the English army in 1792 and sentenced to life imprisonment. In this way, the British took the vow to expand the empire by crushing the rebellion of Fakir.

Haji Shariatullah and Faraizi movement

Haji Shariatullah's name is particularly memorable in the history of Muslim renaissance in the subcontinent. The fire of rebellion he ignited by scorning his own life for the liberation of the proletarian peasants, laborers and laborers of Bengal, who were crushed by the British rule, is really amazing. Although the reform movement introduced by him was mainly non-political, he was the first to sow the seeds of rebellion among the people and left his legacy in the history of the liberation struggle of Bengalis.

Childhood life and religious education: He was born in 1781 AD in Shamail village under Madaripur subdivision (now district) of Faridpur district. When his father Abdul Jalil Talukdar passed away, he was brought up under the supervision of his uncle Azim Uddin. He was only eight years old then. Deprived of school and college education, Shariatullah gained knowledge on various aspects of theology. The knowledge of Dharmashastra made his mind inquisitive in spiritual thoughts at a young age. Therefore, at the age of eighteen, Shariatullah went to Makkah Sharif to perform Hajj to get rid of the society's corruption. He stayed there for twenty years and received religious education and came in contact with a religious reform movement called the Wahhabi movement. Then in 1818 he returned to his homeland.

Faraizi Movement: Back home, seeing the superstitious society, his reformed mind became outraged against social injustice and lawlessness. In the early part of the 19th century, he led a movement to protect the proletarian peasantry from the tyranny and oppression of landlords, inilkars and moneylenders. This reform movement led by him is known in history as the Faraizi movement. The word 'Farj' means that which is obligatory. The Faraji movement originated from the word farz. Its sole aim was to build a prejudice-free lifestyle through the political, social and economic development of the oppressed and downtrodden people of Bengal.

The condition of the people: At the height of his reform movement, the condition of the Muslim society in Bengal became extremely deplorable

Pir Puja, Grave Pooja, Tazia ritual of Muharram month etc. were common among Muslims in Hindu influenced society. As a result of excessive British rule and exploitation, the economic backbone of Bengal collapsed, the common people in Bengal lost the right to laugh and mud freely. On the other hand, the Hindu zamindars and indigo farmers took vows of the reform movement to oppress and oppress them. Public life in Bengal became miserable. In such a difficult time of the Bengali nation, the liberation of the mad Shariatullah is the liberation of the common people

His Mass Communication System: Possessing infinite courage and strong self-belief, Haji Shariatullah urged the people of all walks of life to stand tall against social exploitation, oppression and various superstitions and evil practices. He visited various districts like Faridpur, Dhaka, Comilla and Barisal and united the people against social prejudices and established the relationship between Ustad and Sagare. British-ruled Indian subcontinent declared 'Darul Harb' and banned Eid Jumma prayers. Haji Shariatullah and his followers toured the villages of Bengal and preached the ideals of Islam among the degenerate Muslims and instructed them to refrain from un-Islamic activities. He banned the practice of tajiya during the month of Muharram and dancing at weddings as un-Islamic.

Objectives of Movement: The main objective of his reform movement was to educate the ignorant against social prejudices. Establishing ideals against non-idealism and making Muslims properly pious by proclaiming jihad of justice against injustice and vowing to fight for justice against tyrants, indigo-growers and landlords.

Momentum of the Reform Movement: The call of the fearless Haji Shariat Ullah awakened the pulse of liberation in thousands of people and they formed a formidable resistance system against the tyranny and oppression of the colonial rulers. In this, the British government and its pet landlords, Nilkars and moneylenders, worried about the future, continued to obstruct the religious activities of the Muslims. They stopped Muslims from offering Eid sacrifices, even stopping the mosque from calling the call to prayer. In addition, they used to extort money from Muslims for Kali Puja and Durga Puja. In this context, Yogesh Chandra Bagal said, "The tyranny of zamindars and inilkars on Muslims was miserable." As a result of such oppression of zamindars and indigo farmers, thousands of farmers of Bengal started joining the movement in groups. The authorities were appalled at the horrors of the movement, as it united Muslims against them." The zamindars were terrified. According to James Wise, "The landlords were alarmed by the spread of the Faraji movement.

Death of Shariatullah: Through his solitary efforts, the Faraji movement gained wide acceptance and initiated a renaissance among Muslims. But he could not see the end of it. His death in 1840 AD is the hope of all is able Conclusion: In conclusion, the importance of Haji Shariatullah is immense in the history of anti-British movement and nationalism in Bengal. He sowed the seeds of the independence movement in the Bengali nation through the Faraji movement, and later on, the Bengali nation moved forward step by step to achieve the desired goal after being initiated by the fire mantra.

Dudu Mia

Early life: After the death of Haji Shariatullah, his son Muhammad Mohsin alias Dudu Mia turned the movement into a political movement. took the lead. He was born in Mulfat Ganj upazila of present Madaripur district in 1819 AD. Although he was not well-educated in education, he had wonderful organizational skills. He soon took charge of his father's religious movement Formation of Lathial Bahini: After primary education, he went to Makkah at the age of twelve. On the way to Makkah, he stayed in Calcutta on the first day and met Shaheed Timir. He returned home after receiving religious education for five years. Then he freed the peasants from the oppression of the tyrannical landlords and indigo miners formed a strong Lathial army to protect.

Campaign against Zamindars: After the death of Haji Shariatullah, Dudu Mia Faraiji took charge of the movement. With his leadership, the Faraji movement took on a new form. They conducted an operation against the tyrannical landlord. The zamindar was frightened and signed a peace treaty with the Farajids, agreeing not to oppress the peasants.

He then launched a campaign against the powerful Zamindar Ghosh family of Faridpur and killed Madan Ghosh. The killings led to a case against his party and the British government imprisoned 117 Farajis. Only 22 of them were sentenced for 7 years and the rest were acquitted.

Conflict between Dudu Mia and Anderson: Unable to resist the momentum of Dudu Mia's movement, the tyrannical landlords incited the British government and the indigo miners against him. As a result, he soon came into conflict with Nilkar Anderson of Madaripur at the instigation of the zamindars. Anderson filed several false cases against him. But by God's will every time Dudu Mia was proved innocent. In this, his influence, prestige and respect increased. As a result the tyrannical landlords and government bureaucrats were forced to pay attention to the just demands of the peasants. Dudu Mia was fearless like his father. He was able to give momentum to the Farajids by suffering endless suffering and torture for the completion of his father's unfinished work. With his sole efforts, the Faraji movement changed from a religious movement to a political one.

He was imprisoned during the Sepoy Mutiny in 1857 AD and was released in 1860 AD. Then in 1862 AD, he left Ihdham after suffering a lot.

Wahhabi movement

In the latter part of the 18th century, religious and social decline began with the deterioration of political life in almost all Muslim countries. During this time some reform movements were created among the Muslims. Muhammad Ibn Abdul Wahhab, a native of Nejad province in Arabia, launched a reform movement. This movement is known as the Wahhabi movement after his name. The main objective of his reform movement was to remove superstitions and un-Islamic customs and restore the Muslim society to the simple ideals prescribed by the Holy Quran and Hadith. Many called the Faraji movement as the Wahhabi movement of the subcontinent. Historically, this allegation is not correct. In India too, a religious reform movement was conducted in the 19th century under the leadership of Syed Ahmed Barelvi, known as the Wahhabi movement in India. Under the leadership of Syed Ahmed, this movement was conducted as a religious reform movement, but later it took the form of an anti-British movement.

In fact, the purpose of the Faraji movement was to regulate the religious and social life of Muslims according to the ideals of Islam. Haji Shariatullah instilled confidence in the masses and taught them to stand unitedly against injustice and his son Dudu Mia instilled wonderful vitality in the people and built a powerful popular revolution through the Faraji movement. He fought against powerful oppressors with the brilliance of a religious warrior against the prestigious zamindars and inilkars. The story of Faraizi leader's struggle is a very exciting chapter in the history of Bangladesh.

Politics had nothing to do with the Faraji Praja movement. H. about the ideals and programs of Farajids. Beveridge writes, “Faraizi has often been identified with the Wahhabis. There is no doubt that there is similarity between these two doctrines. Their objective is religious reform. Both aimed at re-establishing the ideals preached by Prophet Muhammad (pbuh), and both campaigned to remove superstitious practices from Muslim society, but it does not appear that the Faraizis harbored any dangerous political views like the Wahhabis or their revolutionary ideas of Hindu zamindars. It has expanded into nothing more than contesting the claim. The Hindu zamindars are accustomed to look upon the Farajids as a political menace, but I think such an idea is baseless.” So the Wahhabi movement in Bangladesh is not a historical event.

Martyr Titumir (1782 – 1831 AD)

Titumir was born in the year 1782 in Chandpur village of Twenty Four Parganas district. Born of noble birth, Titumi was possessed of sharp intelligence, gentle appearance, developed personality and extraordinary physical strength from his childhood. He was a very brave and thoughtful person. There was no one else in Bangladesh at that time who was his equal in wrestling and weapons. The heart of Titumir, who was extremely brave and strong, was full of religious feelings.

Opposition to his movement: Titumir's movement was initially aimed at religious and social reform. But within a few days, the general English ruling class, which oppressed the movement, strongly opposed it. Landlords, financiers, English inilkars, due to the economic struggle of people

Impact of movement and protest against injustice by Titumir: In 1821 Syed Ahmad Shaheed went on Hajj to Calcutta. Syed Ahmad Shaheed stayed in Calcutta for some time before leaving for Hajj. At that time many Bengali Muslims became his murids. So Syed Ahmad Shaheed's reform movement influenced Titumir's life. Before him, Haji Shariatullah's reform movement had spread far and wide. Along with that, Titumi's zamindar, Nilkar did. Tejaswi and Tikshnadhi Titumir naturally oppose this. and tyranny of moneylenders, unjust and illegal taxes, levies and the indifference of the English rulers to remedy them.

Syed Ahmad's Political Apprenticeship: Titumir was imprisoned in 1820 on charges of rioting, as revealed in the government papers of the time. After being released from jail in 1822, Titumir happened to meet a person from the Shahi family of Delhi. That same year Titumir accompanied him to Mecca for Hajj. There he is Syed Ahmed He became close to Berelvi and took spiritual and political discipleship from him. In the company of Syed Ahmed, he was inspired by Titumi's revolutionary thoughts. He embarked on a struggle against the tyrannical landlords and indigo farmers. The aims of his struggle were mainly 2- (1) social reform and spread of religious education and (2) emancipation of the masses from the tyranny of landlords and indigo miners. Titumir believed wholeheartedly that unless social prejudices and blind superstitions were removed, Muslims could not attain a progressive outlook on life. So he devoted himself to preaching reformation.

Aims of reform movement and instructions to followers

The main aim of his preaching was—

(a) Full faith in Islam,

(b) Following the instructions of Rasulullah (S), (c) Hindu-Muslim (d) Establishing unity of peasants, call to unite against tyrannical landlords and indigo miners.

In fact, Titumir's spiritual program was to preach Islam and practice religion without reform. The social program was to organize the oppressed and poor masses against the tyrannical landlords and indigo farmers. As a result of Muktipagal Titumir's zealous religious calling and propaganda, three to four hundred people accepted discipleship in a very short period of time. In dress, behavior they formed a separate group. All the orders of Titumir were strictly followed by his followers. Even Aharadi and social association with any other Muslims outside themselves was forbidden. Shaheed Titumir mainly preached the principles of Syed Ahmad and Haji Shariatullah. There was no particular difference between them in terms of religion and social reform. Titumi's pirs and graves were worshiped, all kinds of indirect and direct associations with paganism were banned, Muharram festival was banned, etc. Even his followers were strictly instructed to keep beards and wear special clothes. Moreover, he forbade his followers to pay illegal taxes and revenue to zamindars and indigo collectors.

It is true that Titumir's influence was not as widespread as that of Haji Shariatullah, but as a result of his wonderful organizational skills, his influence and prestige were established in a territory 18 to 20 miles long and 10 to 12 miles wide in Barasa.

As his popularity and organizational skills gradually increased, the British colonial ruling clique and tyrannical landlords became fearful and apprehensive. They started obstructing his preaching in various ways. Titumir soon mobilized the oppressed poor masses against the tyrannical landlords and raised a powerful Lathial army. Basically his struggle was against tyranny, exploitation and torture. At that time, indigo merchants with the help of Hindu zamindars forced farmers to cultivate indigo. Therefore, Titumir took a vow of direct struggle against the Hindu landlords for the liberation of the poor people. So many tried to call him sectarian and bigoted. But Titumir was never communal. He started military education uniting all the oppressed people, Hindu and Muslim, in the struggle for justice against injustice. Miskin Ali Khan, a devotee of Titumir, became the Prime Minister and the heroic Ghulam Masum took charge of his military organization.

Violent activities of the zamindars to destroy Titumir: As the Muslims of Barasat region were united under the leadership of Titumir, the Hindu zamindars became very alarmed and organized to destroy him.

be The zamindars of Gobardanga, Purnia and Gobindpur attacked Titumir with armed forces. Krishnadev Roy, the zamindar of Gobindpur, led the attack. But not being able to stand up to the bravery and bravery of Titumir's loyal forces, he unjustly fined and beat him. They fled. After this incident, Zamindar Krishnadev Roy forcibly arrested some of Titumir's followers.

Increase in tyranny of the zamindars; On 7 August 1830, a suit was filed against the zamindar Ramnarayan in the magistrate's court at Barasat on the same charge, but the suit was dismissed on the grounds of partiality on the part of the magistrate. As a result the tyranny and torture of the landlords increased day by day. They levied a tax of two and a half rupees on the beards of Titumir's followers. When the people of Sarfarajpur village refused to pay this tax, the tyranny escalated and a mosque was burnt down by the zamindar's men. In view of this incident, both parties filed a lawsuit in Barasat Magistrate's Court. But it was canceled by a false report of a Hindu robber.

Titumir's Rebellion against the British: In the wake of the incident, Zamindar Krishnadev Roy and Kaliprasanna Mukhopadhyay tried to avenge the defeat by adopting a new approach. They complained to the British government that Titumir had declared rebellion against the zamindars and indigo farmers and against the British government. But Akutobhoy Titumir tries to convince the government that he has no complaint against the government. What he did was only against the tyrannical landlords and in the interest of the oppressed and exploited people. But due to colonial interests, the English ruling class did not heed his words and instead sent magistrate Alexander against Titumir to discipline him. He was very angry with the English rulers and formed an independent state with his people as part of the government. organized against This time he declared rebellion against the government in twenty-four parganas, some of Nadia and Faridpur districts

Bamboo fort erected to repel government attack: In view of the incident, Barasat Magistrate attacked Titumir with a large police force. But when Magistrate Alexander was defeated by his loyal forces and fled, Barlat Bentinck was greatly alarmed. This time Titumir did not accept the plan of his chief assistant and trusted disciple Ghulam Masum and Miskin

Ali to resist the attack of the strong and well-educated forces of the British, then they would destroy him. So he was prepared in advance. In efforts, a bamboo fort was established in the village of Narikelbaria. He realized that when the government was his argument

Declaration of war and fall of Titumir: Lord Bentinck Lt. A well-armed force was sent against Titumir under the leadership of Colonel Stewart. Titumir was fully aware of the consequences of this war. But still he did not submit. Spurred on by the fiery oath of independence, he pounced on the English forces with his half-educated retinue. But his bamboo fort could not survive long in the face of the cannon. Yet he fought like a hero and was martyred along with many of his followers. This fighting spirit of his is the direction of the light path of the brave freedom fighters of later times. Ghulam Masum, Titumir's trusted aide and assistant, was captured in the battle along with many of his followers. Later Ghulam Masum and many others were hanged in the name of justice. 19 of the prisoners were exiled for life and the remaining 53 were acquitted.

Importance of bamboo fort: Titumir's bamboo fort is a bright protest against the tyranny and torture of Bangladesh. It is true that his movement ended in failure, but there was no reason to expect success under the circumstances of the time. If only the struggle was against the zamindars and the indigo miners, there might have been a hope of victory. But where the government, the zamindar and the inilkars are on the same side, the success of a struggling hero like Titumir or Dudu Mia is only wishful thinking. It is undeniable that this fact gave courage to the common man to stand against a much stronger enemy. To say that he did not have the power to perceive would be a disservice to the truth. Radical progressivism is what liberates him

Not only that, the phase of Muslim freedom struggle that started in the beginning of the nineteenth century, this brilliant protest of Titumir is an integral part of it. The bamboo fort has been destroyed, but its immortal memory has given the spirit and motivation of the freedom struggle of Bengalis for ages. Titumir's self-sacrifice and bamboo fort have never failed, rather, it has been a guide for freedom-seeking people throughout the ages. So we can say this without hesitation, "Titumi is a burning symbol of liberation, a name of Titumi - Titumi is the proud history of the Bengali nation."

Rebellion against indigo miners

The Blue Rebellion of the 19th century was a landmark event in the history of Bengal. The Blue Rebellion of 1859 to 1861 forced the peasant community of Bengal to participate in the anti-British movement. Based on this rebellion, political movements started in different regions of India. The peasant society of Bengal took part in this rebellion.

The Industrial Revolution in Europe led to a massive expansion of textiles. As artificial dyes were not discovered at that time, the demand for indigo was immense. The climate of Bengal and the Indian subcontinent was suitable for indigo cultivation and the cost of production was the lowest. Therefore, the British chose the land of India and Bengal for indigo cultivation and started the practice of indigo cultivation. In the first half of the 19th century, the amount of indigo cultivation increased greatly in Bengal. As indigo farmers were making a lot of money from indigo cultivation, more and more Englishmen got involved in this business.

Farmers were not at all interested in indigo cultivation as indigo cultivation was unprofitable. The English could not be satisfied as the farmers were unwilling to cultivate indigo. They force the farmers to cultivate indigo through various oppressions. The British government enacted laws in support of the indigo planters, forcing the peasants to grow indigo and sponsoring peasant torture. They force the farmer to take the dowry. The indigo miners continued to exploit the farmers through the Dadan system.

The farming community of Bengal felt that indigo cultivation was compulsory. So they were angry with the behavior of the British but did not dare to protest against indigo cultivation. But in 1859, Barasat Magistrate Eden issued an order prohibiting government pressure on unwilling cultivators to cultivate indigo. It states that an unwilling cultivator cannot be forced to cultivate indigo. Lord Meckley also recommended severe punishment against dishonest and oppressive indigo traders. But it could not be implemented because the government had the support of an influential group

After the pronouncement of the Magistrate of Barasat, the misconception of the farmers of Bengal that indigo cultivation was compulsory came to an end. Then farmers started organizing against indigo cultivation. Then, in late 1959, the first revolt against indigo cultivation broke out in the rural areas of Krishnanagar. In 1860, this rebellion became serious. Soon this revolt The intensity of the agitation spread to the districts of Nadia, Jessore, Rajshahi, Pabna, Faridpur, Rangpur etc. In the early days, Rafiq Mandal, Chougachar Digambar Biswas and Vishnuvaran Biswas. Although conducted normally, later the movement turned into violence. Neel was one of the leaders of the rebellion.

Contemporaneous period when various reports were published in newspapers and magazines in support of the indigo rebellion, hatred against the British was created in the public mind. In such a situation, the British government constituted a commission. In 1861, based on the report of the said commission, the British government declared that indigo cultivation depended on the will of the farmers.

It can be concluded that the British government was forced to bow down to the natives for the first time through the Blue Rebellion.

Freedom struggle of 1857

In 1856 Lord Canning succeeded Lord Dalhousie as the Governor General of the Indian subcontinent. He was a hardworking person. But he lacked enough political foresight. An important event of his reign was the Indian Sepoy Mutiny or First War of Independence. There is considerable disagreement among historians about the naming of this battle. Some historians call the revolution of 1857 AD a 'soldier revolt' and some call it a 'national struggle'. However, realizing the importance of the participation of the people in the revolution with the sepoys, it is more reasonable to call it the 'Great Mutiny' of the Indian subcontinent rather than the 'Sepoy Mutiny' or the War of Independence in an impartial judgement. However, the cause of the Great Revolt is undeniable that in the light of the Indian Great Revolt, the people of the subcontinent were inspired in the spirit of future freedom wars.

The Great Indian Mutiny or the War of Independence did not take place for any particular reason. There were many reasons behind this. The tyranny, persecution, military and religious causes of the long hundred years of British rule from Palashi in 1757 to the Great Mutiny of 1857 are discussed below: The expression of exploitation and torture is Sepoy Mutiny or War of Independence. The political, social, economic,Political reasons.

Anti-British attitude of the rulers: After the battle of Plashir in 1757, the power of the British East India Company in this country grew at an unstoppable pace. The Company's rulers began to interfere in the governance of the native princely classes to subvert British power by subterfuge. As a result, the native Nawabs and royals lost their political power and became completely dependent on the British rulers. Clive's dualism and Wellesley's subservient alliance are prime examples. As a result of the policy of subservient alliance, the native princes lost their political power and became disoriented. But when Hastings's diplomacy failed, they naturally became anti-British. In addition, as a result of Cornwallis's administrative reforms, Indian people began to feel dissatisfied when they failed to get high government jobs.

Implementation of disenfranchisement policy: Dalhousie's infamous disenfranchisement policy was one of the reasons for the revolt of 1857 AD. Applying this policy, the states like Satara, Jhansi, Nagpur, Sambalpur denied the rights of adopted sons and directly included those states in the British Empire. Dalhousie grants to the Nawabs of Tanjore and Karnataka and to the Peshwa Baji Rao II So many sons deprived Nana Saheb of his scholarship and rights. As a result, Nana Saheb and Jhansi's queen Lakshmibai Dalhousie took the initiative to abolish the title of Mughal emperor and expel him from the Red Fort in Delhi, directly participating in the Indian rebellion. In addition, the discourtesy of the British towards the Amirs of Sindh and the Muslims became highly disaffected and agitated. Dalhousie showed extreme inhumanity regarding Nagpur and Ayodhya. He looted the royal palace of Nagpur and brought about the extinction of the royal family. According to John K in this connection, all the furniture, jewels, ornaments, even elephants and horses of the Bhosle palace were looted and several of them were openly sold in Calcutta. As a result of all these inhuman atrocities and tortures, the Indian soldiers, royals and people began to unite against the British.

The dethronement of Nawab Wazed Ali on charges of misrule and Dalhousie's invasion of Ayodhya are indicative of extreme inferiority. Since long ago the Nawabs of Ayodhya were loyal to the British and did not oppose anything. However, Ayodhya was not spared from the violent attacks of the British.

According to John K

"False to their people false to their manhood they (Nawabs) were true to the British government."

In addition to the discourteous treatment of the helpless begums of Ayodhya and the abduction of wealth and the Bhosle palace. The gruesome scene of looting infuriated the people against the British. In this context, Dr. Majumder said, "As a result of Ayodhya's annexation to the British empire, all classes of landlords, Muslims, elites, military, traders and farmers of Ayodhya state became angry." The Great Revolt of 1857 was the manifestation of the united efforts of the people's anger at the tyranny of the British rule for a hundred years, the dethroned, disenfranchised nobility and the people.

Social factors

Mistreatment of the Indians by the British: Social discontent among the masses at all levels was responsible for the rebellion of 1857 AD. Since the beginning of the British rule, the attitude of hatred of the rulers towards the Indians caused deep pain and despair in the hearts of the people of this country. According to one historian, "The British deliberately avoided contact with Indians." They called Indians barbarians and Christian priests openly condemned Hindu idolatry and social reforms. It will be evident from the words of Warren Hastings that, "A Few years ago most of the English regarded the Indians almost as Barbarians." Furthermore, the British rulers tried to create a big gap between the Hindu community by passing laws.

Hindu-Muslim Suspicion of Reform Movements: Hindus have been very scrupulous in following their social norms since time immemorial. But the company's social reform and public welfare activities struck a chord with the religious sentiments of fundamentalist Hindus and Muslims in the country. The passing of laws abolishing the practice of burning sati, the practice of widow marriage, the introduction of English education, railways and the telegraph system upset the people of India. The fear of apostasy by the countrymen took the form of collective Hindu-Muslim simmering discontent.

Tyranny of the rulers against the people: At this time, the Christian priests preaching Christianity, giving the right to enjoy the ancestral property to the converted Indians, the unspeakable oppression and torture of the British rulers against the Indian men and women fueled the Sepoy Mutiny. Makes Indians anti-British. The situation became more dire when the British government passed laws forcing Indian sepoys to fight outside the subcontinent. Indian soldiers and public in such situations

Economic reasons

Hastings' illegal means of making money infuriated the native rulers: the Company's economic reforms were one of the causes of the Sepoy Mutiny or Indian War of Independence. From the beginning of the Company's rule, the British rulers had agitated their finances against the British. In order to achieve prosperity, he indulged in the futile efforts to earn money through various illegal means. In addition, the looting of Rani Bhavani and the Begum of Ayodhya and the dethronement of Chaitsingh for non-payment of money naturally made the princes and nawabs of this country dispossessed.

Permanent Settlement Lakhraj Land Expropriation Exacerbates People's Plight: The Permanent Settlement introduced by Cornwallis recognized the ownership of land by the zamindars but severely affected the landless peasants. About the evils of this system, Powell said, the permanent settlement unexpectedly creates many evils. The permanent settlement broke the financial backbone of Bengal's peasantry and failed to pay revenue on time. As a result, the company passed the 'Sunset Act' and deprived many zamindars of their zamindari. In addition, many zamindari talukdars in Bengal alone were deprived of their land due to the confiscation of Lakheraj land property. As a result, the sacked employees of the Rajyahara royal family, zamindars and talukdars were deprived of all their financial opportunities and all their means of livelihood were blocked. According to J. Kaye, "Men and women of noble families who lived in opulence and luxury were suddenly overthrown and sold furniture and ornaments, and even women of noble families began to make a living by begging at other people's houses at night." In such a situation it was very natural for the people to revolt against the British rule.

Destruction of industries: Although the British rulers ruled India for a long time, they never built any industries for the national interest of the country. Rather, in favor of their national interests, they destroy the industries and factories of this country and smuggle Indian raw materials abroad. As a result, it became a colony of foreign goods and the country's gold and silver were smuggled out. As a result of economic exploitation, the condition of the people in the country became very deplorable. In addition, imposition of chowkidari tax, road tax and vehicle tax on the public caused great protests among the people as well as the Indian army.

Religious reasons

The religion of the Christian priests also made Indians suspicious: Indian religious reasons were one of the reasons behind the Sepoy Mutiny. Both Indian Hindus and Muslims have been valuing religion since ancient times. But the movement of Christian priests to the subcontinent from the beginning of British rule created great suspicion in the minds of Indians. In the 19th century, the overt preaching of Christian priests made the Indians skeptical. They went to schools-colleges, markets-ports and even jails and started evangelizing among the inmates. They started teaching the Bible in some government schools. When the law was passed in 1856 AD and the Hindus who converted to Christianity were given the right to enjoy the property of their children, both Indian Hindus and Muslims were worried about the future of their respective religions.

Social reforms were not easily accepted by Indians: the situation became more dire when he introduced the abolition of satiy, English education and widow marriage, railways and the telegraph. Indian Hindu-Muslim sepoys erupted in protest when Hindu-Muslim sepoys were forced to fight outside the subcontinent. Both of them were terrified of losing their religion. Besides, with the passing of the General Service Englishmen Act, the simmering discontent of the Indian people for the Indian cause took the form of the War of Independence.

Military reasons

The direct cause of the sepoy mutiny was the introduction of discriminatory policies in the military. From the beginning of the Company's rule, the British rulers adopted a discriminatory policy towards the Indian sepoys. Indian soldiers do in the field of service

They were given retirement instead of promotion if they showed competence. However, they were promoted up to habildar. Even in terms of pay, there was a sky-high gap between domestic and foreign sepoys, the situation became extreme when the law was passed and Indian sepoys were forced to fight in foreign countries. Indian Hindu sepoys considered the voyage as the cause of their apostasy. Additionally, the introduction of the Enfield rifle at this time ignited a hundred years of smoldering discontent. The barrel of this rifle had to be cut with teeth and put into the gun. As the fat used in the tota consisted of pig and cow fat, the Hindu-Muslim sepoys refused to use it for fear of defection and rebelled against the ruling class. When the oppressed and disenfranchised masses of India joined forces with the mutinous sepoys, it soon led to the Great Indian Revolution.

The spread of rebellion

Declaration of Mutiny: In March 1857, the first sepoy mutiny took place in Barrackpore Cantonment. In an instant, the fire of rebellion was burning all over India. When the news of Barrackpore reached Lucknow, the sepoys there rescued the captive sepoys from the declaration of mutiny. by doing A similar rebellion then spread to the Meerut cantonment. Jail mutinous sepoys for killing and looting

Bahadur Shah was declared as the emperor: Then on May 11, the rebel sepoys reached Delhi and Bahadur Shah was established as the main base of the rebels at Jhansi in Delhi. Declare as emperor and indiscriminately killed European men and women, infant girls. Delhi, Meerut, Lucknow, Kanpur, Declaration of independence in various provinces: News of the success of the mutinous sepoys in Delhi spread to Ayodhya and Rohilakhand and a mass rebellion broke out. Begum Hazrat Mahal led the rebellion of Ayodhya. Similarly, Nana Saheb took the leadership of the rebels by establishing an independent government in Kanpur. In Bareilly, Khan Bahadur Khan, a descendant of Hafiz Rahmat Khan, declared himself the local representative of the Emperor of Delhi and led the revolt. On the other hand, Rani Lakshmi Bai declared independence and ruled Jhansi independently. But as Punjab, Gwalior, Nepal and other Rajput states did not join the war of independence, the British government was soon able to suppress it.

The sepoy revolution is the manifestation of the accumulated pain of the proletarian people of India for a hundred years. The rebellion was at first so fierce that it seemed as if the British Government had been completely eliminated from India. However, the rebellion was soon suppressed by the British commanders with the help of Punjabi, Nepalese and Sikh soldiers and with the cooperation of several native nobles.

Capture of Delhi: The British were the first to realize the importance of recapturing Delhi to restore British status and prestige. After a long four-month siege, British commander Sir John Lawrence recaptured Delhi. Under the oppression of the British forces Many innocent men and women were killed in Delhi. While hiding in the tomb of Mughal Emperor Bahadur Shah Humayun, he was caught by an English general named Hardson. He was exiled to Rangoon and his two sons and grandson were brutally murdered.

Recovery of Lucknow and Kanpur: The British had to suffer a lot in suppressing the Lucknow rebellion. At first the rebels besieged the English Resident and killed Commander Lawrence. Then the British forces under the leadership of Colin Campbell fought for five months and captured Lucknow.Nanasaheb took the leadership of the rebels in Kanpur but was ultimately defeated and took refuge in the jungles of Nepal.

Ahmad Ullah killed by traitors : Rescue of Rohilakhand : In Rohilakhand patriot Ahmad Ullah was leading the rebels. But when he was shot dead by a treacherous zamindar, after a long year Campbell Sahib recovered Rohilakhand. Thus Nanasaheb's commander Tantia Topi was captured by the British and Rani Lakshmi Bai of Jhansi was valiantly killed. Thus, the British rulers with the help of Indian traitors suppressed this rebellion and recaptured their ceded territories in India.

The nature of rebellion

Differences of opinion among historians: The Great Revolt in the Indian subcontinent in 1857 shook the foundations of the British Empire. There is a difference of opinion among local and foreign historians whether this movement was just a 'soldier's rebellion' or a struggle for the liberation of Indians. Most of the European historians have called this movement as Sepoy Mutiny. According to them, insurgency took shape only in those areas of India where sepoys were in majority. Most of the nobles and landlords did not support this rebellion. Again the historical J. B. Norton, Dr. Duff and Holmes differed on the nature of this movement. According to them, at first it started as a sepoy rebellion but later it took the form of Indian national movement. In India's Madhya Pradesh, Jhansi, Kanpur, Ayodhya, Delhi and Rohilakhand, the rebellion gained momentum and managed to gain popular support. According to these historians, the French Revolution was started by a handful of people in Paris and later became a national movement. According to them, "a movement can demand a national movement if it has the support of the majority of the people for the main objective of the movement."

Dr. Sen and Dr. Majumdar's comments: Dr. According to Majumdar, there was no single distinctive form of the Great Revolt; It took different forms in different areas. According to him, the Great Mutiny of 1857 was essentially a mutiny of sepoys, somewhere behind the sepoys there was an open revolt of the local elite, talukdars and prajads; Elsewhere there was active or passive public sympathy. On the one hand, as the Rajyahara royalty and the talukhara talukdars, zamindars, titled elites and peasants joined the movement to strengthen it, on the other hand the vested interests did not fail to help the opposition. Again according to Dr. Sen, the aim of the rebel leaders in the regions where there was popular support was to 'make a counter-revolution'.

Conclusion: Therefore, if the views of Dr. Majumder and Dr. Sen are accepted as true, it must be said that the rebellion of 1857 was not only a mutiny of sepoys, but it cannot be called a national liberation struggle in India. Because the rebels had no definite course of action. Any noble cause has a purpose or a goal but for the revolution of 1857 the rebels had no specific goal. If this revolt was initiated as a revenge against tyranny and oppression for a long hundred years, its precise course of action and by whom the revolt would be led is not determined. In addition, the rebels have just started a counter-revolution by occupying their respective areas and declaring independence. Therefore, it is more reasonable to call it the Indian Sepahi or the War of Independence, but rather the Indian Mutiny. But it must be admitted that the future generations are inspired by the spirit of the future liberation struggle from the fire of great revolt which the Indian people ignited with fierce courage against the exploitation, tyranny, oppression and harshness of the long hundred years of British rule.

The movement of 1857 AD failed due to various reasons. The reasons for its failure are given below:

First, the rebels could not trust each other. They participated in rebellion for personal gain. It was limited to Uttar Pradesh, Rohilkhand, Ayodhya, Delhi, Bengal and Bihar as the rebels had no pre-planned objectives. As a result, the people of the free areas supported the British government and demoralized the rebels.

Secondly, none other than the Rani of Jhansi, the Begum of Ayodhya and the Rajas, Talukdars and Zamindars of some other petty states took part in this great revolt. On the other hand, Bahadur Jung of Nepal, Begum of Bhupal, Raja of Jodhpur helped the British government to suppress the rebellion. As a result the objectives of the rebels soon ended in failure.

Thirdly, cohesion and conflict of ideology among the rebels is one of the reasons for failure. The Mughal Emperor Bahadur Shah, the Maratha leader Nanasaheb and the Rani of Jhansi were busy re-establishing power in their respective areas. The Indian sepoys became hesitant and weak due to lack of proper guidance. Dr. Majumder and Dr. Sen said, "This rebellion was not pre-planned and was not carried out according to a specific plan." That's why it fails.

Fourthly, one of the reasons for the downfall of the sepoys was that there was no leader among them to lead the entire subcontinent.

Fifth, the British military was more advanced and better equipped than the subcontinentals. It was impossible for the Indian sepoys to fight against the modern armed British forces with old gunpowder guns

Sixth, the English generals were more efficient and loyal than the subcontinental leaders. Lawrence Outrun, Nichols or Neal was not one of the Rebels as a fearless and resourceful leader.

Seventhly, as the rebels did not have any central organization or central leader, it was not possible to conduct the war properly. Eighth, Lord Canning was a wise and prudent ruler. He did not adopt a harsh and repressive policy towards the rebels but adopted a policy of liberality and peace. As a result, the rebellion was soon quelled.

End of Company rule and assumption of Queen's rule: Although the struggle of 1857 AD failed, the consequences of the Sepoy Mutiny of 7 AD were far-reaching. As a result of these revolts, the end of Company rule in India was very important. The British Government not feeling it safe to entrust the administration of India to the Company, by a Proclamation dated 2 August 1858, entrusted the administration of India to Queen Victoria of England. The regency was released with the Governor General of India as the representative of the Queen of England. On November 1, 1858, the ruling authority of India came under the control of the Parliament with the help of the Maharani and the Constitution of India's Best Governance was drafted by the Parliament.

First, the Queen's Proclamation completely abandoned the policy of colonialism in India. Protection of treaties signed with native royalty, recognition of adopted sons, protection of religion and appointment of Indians to government service according to merit and the infamous dispossession policy were abolished forever.

Secondly, the Charter Act of 1833 changed the centralization policy and adopted the decentralization policy. Then the Bombay and Madras Councils were entrusted with the responsibility of making laws by the Indian Councils Act of 1861.

Thirdly, the government mobilized all the Indian sepoys who participated in the struggle and took precautionary measures. After that, by increasing the number of European troops, he arranged to keep the responsibility of the Indian artillery under the control of the British forces.

Fourth, after the suppression of the mutiny, severe punishment was meted out to those soldiers who were involved in the killings. Muslims are punished more than Hindus. Emperor Bahadur Shah was exiled to Rangoon and his two sons and grandson were brutally murdered.

Fifthly, despite the opposition of the Indians, the practice of burning sati was abolished and the English education system was introduced.

Chapter Three
English Colonial Rule: British Period

Introduction

Huns, Mughals, Pathans, English and other European merchant communities came to this country since ancient times with the ambition of extracting the resources of the Indian subcontinent. Failing in the commercial competition, other merchant groups left the Indian subcontinent, but the English remained in the country. By initially entertaining the emperors of Delhi, they gained exclusive commercial privileges in the Indian subcontinent. But after the death of Emperor Aurangzeb, when the central power of Delhi weakened, independent Nawab dynasty emerged in Bengal. Taking advantage of the weakness of India's central power, British commercial standards gradually became a scepter and they began to interfere in Indian politics. The Battle of Palashi in 1757 AD is a prime example of this. After winning the Battle of Buxar in 1765 AD, they directly interfered in the governance of India. The British East India Company actually got the power to rule the country after receiving Diwani from the Emperor Shah Alam of Delhi and from 1765 AD to 1857 AD they continued to rule the country through tyranny and oppression. As a result of the policy of dual rule introduced by Clive, there was a great famine in the country in 1770 AD. As a result, the English public strongly opposed Company rule in India. After that, the peasants, laborers and common people of this country were crushed by the fierce imperialist rule of the company. A number of freedom-crazed people of this country protested against their tyranny and oppression. Under whose leadership fragmented rebellions were formed in different parts of India. Such as Santal Rebellion, Fakir-Monk Rebellion, Rangpur Rebellion, Malda Rebellion, Blue Rebellion etc.

As a result of the imperialist policies of the East India Company, many ousted kings, maharajas and adopted sons of the country rallied against the company's misrule. Finally, when the East India Company adopted a policy of oppression against the Indian sepoys, they became mutineers. Thus the Sepoy Mutiny or the Great Indian Mutiny began in 1857 AD under the leadership of stateless kings, titleless adopted sons and dismissed Sepoys. As a result of this rebellion, the anger and hatred of the Indian public against the East India Company became more pronounced. The British public and company had been strongly protesting against the misrule of the company for a long time. Considering the losses suffered by both sides in the Great Rebellion of 1857 AD, the British authorities decided to end the rule of the East India Company. In 1858, Queen Victoria of England put an end to the rule of the East India Company in India and took over the governance of India. This is undoubtedly an important event. With this declaration of the Queen, almost a hundred years of company misrule was abolished and British rule began again in this country from 1858 AD. As it was not possible for the Maharani to rule the country directly, she managed the governance of India by sending her appointed royal representatives. Thus, the rule of the East India Company in the Indian subcontinent was dissolved and subsequently British rule began again in the country from 1858 AD.

Queen Victoria's Royal Proclamation: The Great Indian Mutiny of 1857 AD struck a blow at the core of Company rule. As a result, the foundations of Company rule weakened and the Indian people became disillusioned with Company rule. Considering the unlimited losses on both sides in the Great Indian Mutiny and with the aim of alleviating the anger and suffering of the Indians, Queen Victoria of England declared the abolition of the Company's rule in 1858 AD by a royal proclamation and directly took over the governance of India. This announcement of Maharani was very important. By this announcement, the Maharani made certain promises and assurances aimed at allaying the anger of the Indian royalty and public.

In this royal declaration, the Queen said that the agreements and promises made by the Company with the Indian rulers and royals during their reign will be carefully observed. The Proclamation also stated that all Indian subjects, irrespective of caste, caste, would be appointed to Government service on the basis of their educational qualifications, just like British subjects. Respect and tolerance for the religious beliefs of the Indian public will be shown. A royal pardon would be granted to all those who had not been charged with the murder of British women during the Great Rebellion and who had yet taken up arms against the British Government. The declaration expressed a strong commitment to the welfare and development of Indians, saying that the prosperity of the people of India is the strength of the government. The satisfaction of the Indians is the security of the British Government. Their gratitude will be considered the best for the British Government. The public anger of India was somewhat mitigated by the British Queen's announcement and they gradually extended their hand of cooperation with the government.

1858 Government of India Act and Procedure

After the Sepoy Mutiny of 1857, the British government realized that India's rule over a business organization like the Company was not secure. Then on August 2, 1858, the British Parliament passed a law and entrusted the governance of India to Queen Victoria of England. Instead of a Board of Control, the Company's Directors appointed one of the British Cabinet Ministers as India Secretary and it was decided that he would administer the affairs of India with the help of a Council of 15 members. As the representative of the British throne, the Governor General is appointed as the Viceroy or the Viceroy.

Appointed Viceroy: Lord Canning was appointed as the first Viceroy or Royal Representative on behalf of the Queen to govern India. Lord Canning focused on establishing peace in the country after taking over. But till then, as the sepoys were hostile in different parts of the country, Lord Canning tried to alleviate the wounds created between the native and foreign and the English rulers by adopting the policy of liberality and peace. As a result of his liberal policies, he was able to establish peace in the country very easily.

His Law Reforms: Liberal Viceroy Lord Canning intervened in several reforms after peacefully suppressing the rebellion. He merged the Indian Civil Courts and the Nezamat Courts to establish a high-powered High Court. Then the Indian Penal Code Act and the Council Act were enacted by Law Secretary Meckley. Under the Indian Council Act, some private members get the opportunity to be nominated to the Baralat's management meeting. As a result, the people of India got some opportunities in the governance of India. Lord Canning opened the door to the Indian Civil Service by passing the Indian Civil Act, reserving a number of high posts for Indians.

Military Organization: Lord Canning reorganized the military. He broke up the army of the company and formed a new army. In the army, he increased the number of European troops rather than Indian. He entrusted the responsibility of the Indian arsenal to the British soldiers.

Revenue Reforms: Lord Canning also played a significant role in revenue reforms. After the struggle of 1857 the company faced financial difficulties. Therefore, after taking over the administration, Canning concentrated on the revenue reforms of India. In this regard, he invited two experts from England and introduced a new fiscal system on their advice. The new system included an increase in income tax, introduction of tolls and the introduction of paper currency. He was able to meet the fiscal deficit by adopting a policy of austerity in military expenditure.

Education Reforms: He also played an important role in the expansion of education. During his reign three universities were established in Calcutta, Madras and Bombay.

Lord Elgin (1862-63 AD)

Lord Elgin succeeded Lord Canning as Viceroy of India. A notable event of his reign was the Wahhabi movement in India. The objective of the Wahhabis was to expel the British from India. That's why he occupied Sitana, the center of the Wahhabis and expelled them from there.

Sir John Lawrence (1864-69 AD): Sir John Lawrence was appointed Viceroy of India in 1864 after Lord Elgin. He was named as the savior of British India by protecting Punjab from the rebels during the rebellion of 1857 AD and recapturing Delhi. The notable events of his reign are the Bhutan war and the relief of famine in Orissa. His foreign policy was one of masterful inaction. By applying this policy to Afghanistan, amity and friendship were kept intact.

Lawrence's Afghan Policy: After the death of Amir Dost Muhammad in 1873 AD, a succession dispute started over the throne of Afghanistan. During the previous viceroy's interference in the internal affairs of the Afghans caused great bitterness. Therefore, considering the previous situation, Lord Lawrence remained neutral. According to him, he will support whoever becomes the emir of the Afghans. His principle is called the principle of dominant passivity. As a result of his policy of inaction, Afghans resented him. When a son of Dost Muhammad named Sher Ali won the war of succession, Lord Lawrence recognized him as the Amir of Afghanistan.

Lord Mayo (1869-72 AD)

After John Lawrence, Lord Mayo was appointed Viceroy of India. His reign is particularly notable for internal reforms. He played an important role in the revenue reforms and entrusted the revenue and expenditure accounts of the province to the provincial government. A notable event of her reign was the visit of the Queen's second son (the Prince of England) to India. He established a college in Ajmer and won public patronage. Sir Syed Ahmed helped him greatly in promoting education in India. He inaugurated the first Department of Census, Statistical Theory, Agriculture and Commerce in India. In 1872, he was killed by an assassin.

Lord Northbrook (1872-76 AD): After Lord Mayo's death, Lord Northbrook was appointed Viceroy of India. During his reign, severe famine occurred in Bihar. Then on the instructions of the Secretary of India, he deposed the Baroda Gaikwad on the pretext of misrule. He reduced the duties on import and export goods to improve trade and commerce. He resigned in 1876 when he had a conflict with the British authorities regarding the Afghan policy.

Lord Lytton (1876-80 AD)

After Lord Northbrook, Lord Lytton was appointed Viceroy of India. He was a political disciple of the then Prime Minister of England Disraeli and a noted literary figure. When the Royal Title Act was passed by the Parliament of England in 1876, Lytton proclaimed Queen Victoria as the Empress of India in a grand ceremony in Delhi.

Lord Lytton's reign in India is particularly notable for several reasons. He displeased the British authorities and the people of India by passing several repressive laws and armistice. He passed the Arms Act and announced the prohibition of possession of arms without a license. Then he took away the freedom of newspapers published in vernacular languages by passing the Press Act. He resigned in 1880 when his foreign policy towards Afghanistan was disapproved by the British authorities.

Lytton's Afghan Policy: Lord Lytton was one of the royal representatives who came to India after 1858 AD. After arriving in India, he became involved in the governance problems of the North-West Frontier and Afghanistan. He abandoned the policies adopted by the later rulers and adopted a new Afghan policy targeting the fear of Russia. The neutral policy adopted by his predecessors was one of the reasons for Russian progress. That is why he abandoned the neutral policy of the previous rulers and followed the forward policy to resist Russian progress. He sent a mission (to Afghanistan) offering to place a British Resident at Hira, seeking the friendship of the Amir of Afghanistan. But when the Afghan Amir Sher Ali refused to comply with this proposal, Lytton declared war on him and occupied Quetta. As a result of Lord Lytton's occupation of Quetta, British-Afghan relations deteriorated.

Second Afghan War: When the British occupied Quetta, Afghan Amir Sher Ali quickly concluded an alliance with the Russian government. In this, the British government's fear of Russia doubled. Lytton became overly alarmed by the Russian-Afghan alliance and sent a British envoy to Afghanistan to express interest in concluding a new treaty with the Afghan emir. But the Afghan Amir, remembering Lord Lytton's past usage, rejected his offer. As a result, Lytton was forced to declare war against Amir Sher Ali of Afghanistan, which is known as the 'Second Afghan War'.

Treaty of Gundamuk: In 1878, British forces invaded Afghanistan and captured the capital Kabul. After Amir Sher Ali was defeated in the battle and fled to Turkestan. The British signed a treaty at Gundamu appointing Sher Ali's eldest son Yakub Khan as the Amir 5 of Kabul. According to the Treaty of Gundamuk, the new Amir, Yaqub Khan, agreed to keep a British Resident in Kabul and gave them control of the British-held passes in Afghanistan, along with the Kerat region. After getting control of all these regions, the British tried to satisfy the Amir by paying six lakh rupees annually to the Amir.

Murder of British Resident by Afghans: Freedom-loving Afghan nation could not accept such arrangement of British government. So they declared rebellion against the British government and killed the British Resident Cavanry and his colleagues in Afghanistan. As a result, the Afghan war started again.

The British commander Roberts quickly occupied Kandahar and defeated the Afghan forces at Charsia and captured the capital Kabul. When Yakub Khan took shelter in the British camp, he was sent to India on suspicion of murdering the British Resident. Then Lytton adopted a plan to cripple Afghanistan administratively by separating Kandahar from Kabul. But at this time, when the conservative party was defeated in the general election of England, the Prime Minister of the liberal party condemned Gladstone Lytton's Afghan policy. As a result Lytton resigned from the post of Vice-Chancellor of the Government of India.

After Lytton's resignation, Lord Ripon was appointed as the new Viceroy of India. He came to India and established a friendship with Sher Ali's nephew Abdur Rahman as the Amir of Kabul for the immediate solution of the Afghan problem. Then Lord Ripon withdrew all British troops from Afghanistan. Ripon promised him every kind of assistance on the promise that the Amir of Afghanistan would not enter into a political agreement with any outside power other than the British Government.

Lord Ripon (1880-84 AD)

His Popularity: Lord Ripon was a member of the Liberal Party of English Prime Minister Gladstone. After the resignation of Lord Lytton in 1880, he was appointed Viceroy of India. His reign is particularly notable in the history of British India for the establishment of peace and various reforms. As a pacifist and ruler, he was strongly opposed to imperialist policies. He was respectful of the political aspirations of the people of India. Ripon adopted a liberal approach to politics and encouraged local self-government. In this way Lord is being remembered forever. Ripon won the hearts of the Indian people by his honest efforts and earned the status of one of the greatest rulers in the history of British rule

Second Afghan War Solution: Lord Ripon was a true peace loving ruler of Gladstone era. He established friendship with him by accepting his rule as Amir. Satisfactorily resolved the Afghan border problem. He is Sher Ali's nephew Abdur Rahman of Afghanistan

Lord Ripon's reforms

Among the British rulers who have graced the history of India since the beginning of the Company's rule, Lord's notable reforms during his reign are discussed below: Ripon was one of them. His reign is noted in the history of British India for various reform works.

First, Lord Ripon was sympathetic to the political aspirations of the Indian masses. He is remembered in the hearts of Indians as a pioneer of democracy by encouraging people to participate in local self-government.1

Secondly, he repealed the Vernacular Press Act introduced by his predecessor Lord Lytton and gave full freedom to express political and social views to the vernacular newspapers.

Thirdly, Lord Ripon carried out some developmental reforms in the secondary education system introduced to make the Indian people well-educated in modern education. Appointed Hunter Commission for development. According to the recommendations of this commission, he carried out several developmental reforms in the primary and secondary education system.

Fourth, the unforgettable event of Lord Ripon's reign was the enactment of the Bengal Municipal Act. By this Act District Boards and Local Boards are constituted with representatives elected by the local people. Even though municipalities were established much earlier, this Act gives the people the authority to manage the municipalities. In addition, public power also prevails in matters of public health, education and social welfare. All these institutions were governed by both designated representatives and members nominated by the government.

Fifthly, Lord Ripon's contribution to the elimination of racial discrimination between Indians and Europeans is undeniable. He already promoted members of the Indian Civil Service to the post of Magistrate and Sessions Judge. No Indian magistrate could previously try Europeans under the Criminal Code Act. but Lord Ripon introduced the Ilbert Bill to empower Indian judges to try European criminals. As a result, the intense anger of the Europeans against the Ilbert Bill. However, Ilbert later amended the bill to the European Jury

It was decided that the Europeans would be judged by Indian judges.

Sixth, the foundation of the revenue and tenancy laws was a notable achievement of his reign. He formulated the tenancy law scheme to improve the condition of the ryots of Bangladesh and Ayodhya. Later it was passed as Bengal Tenancy Act.

Seventhly, Lord Ripon gained special fame by passing the Factory Act in 1881 AD for the welfare of workers. By this act, the rule of working 8 hours a day was introduced for industrial workers. Promulgated in 1881, the first Factory Act banned children under 7 years of age from working in factories and reduced the daily working hours of children under 12 years of age. Owners are severely penalized for negligence, including taking precautions in the case of dangerous equipment. Factory inspectors are appointed to monitor the proper implementation of this Act.

Eighth, the introduction of free trade policies is a memorable event of Ripon's reign. He reduced the duties on salt and other trade goods and abolished the income tax for the benefit of the common people. At the time of Bentinck, Mysore belonged to the British Empire, but Ripon again handed it over to the Mysore dynasty in 1881 AD.

Conclusion: In conclusion, Lord Ripon occupies a prominent place in the history of British India. He is remembered by the countrymen for various development and reform works during his rule.

Lord Dufferin

After Lord Ripon, Lord Dufferin was appointed Chancellor of India. Notable events of his reign include changes in foreign policy, the Third Brahma War and the establishment of the Indian National Congress. It was during his reign that the Bengal Tenancy Act, the foundation of which was authored by Lord Ripon, was passed. By this Act, the interests of the citizens of Bengal, Bihar, Orissa and United Pradesh are protected. During his reign he faced many crises in India. Famine, pestilence and rebellion of Maharashtra leader Balgangadhar Tilak are notable events of his reign.

Lord Curzon (1899-1905 AD)

One of the greatest rulers: After Lord Elgin, Lord Curzon was appointed the Viceroy of India at a very young age in 1899 AD. He was the youngest among the princes. There is no doubt that his academic acumen, diplomatic knowledge and political foresight claimed superiority over other Governor Generals and Viceroys. Historical p. E. Roberts said of his eminence, "For better or for worse, no Governor-General since Lord Dalhousie has been able to exercise so far an influence over the entire Indian administration as he has." His sometimes outspoken foresight earned him the status of one of the greatest rulers of British India. Although his bravery and deep-seated anger in the hearts of Indians, his experience in international politics and his confidence in conducting foreign policy never detracted from the arduous task. Partition of Bengal is one of the memorable events of his rule.

Foreign Policy: As a successful ruler, the protection of British interests and rights in India was one of the goals of his foreign policy. That is why he has to deal with the tribal issues on the western border on Pak-India, Iran, Afghanistan, Tibet.

North-West Frontier Policy: The strong-willed Lord Curzon was a shrewd politician. After taking over the administration of British India, he concentrated on solving the North-West Frontier problem. He abandoned the costly 'Forward Policy' of previous rulers and withdrew British troops from the border areas. He increased the number of troops within the British Empire by deploying tribal forces in the frontier areas. He strengthened the border defense system by constructing military railways up to Darbai, Jamrud Othal for the purpose of sending military aid to the border areas quickly.

With Peshawar as his capital, Lord Curzon created a new province on the North-West Frontier and entrusted its administration to a Chief Commissioner. As a result of this arrangement, the financial expenditure in the border areas has decreased, but there has been no permanent solution to the border problem. Later, during the First World War, there was great unrest in the region.

Afghan Policy: Lord Curzon's Afghan policy undermined British dominance somewhat. The British government's peace treaty with former Amir Abdur Rahman of Afghanistan recorded the British government's commitment to help Afghanistan. But after the death of Amir Abdur Rahman, when his son Habibullah was appointed as the new Amir of Afghanistan, Lord Curzon refused to give him financial assistance and expressed his desire to conclude a new agreement. As a result, there is a conflict between the two. When Lord Curzon temporarily left India, the temporary viceroy Lord Empthill re-established the alliance with Habibullah, keeping the previous agreement with Afghanistan.

Persian Policy: During Lord Curzon's reign, he was dismayed when France, Russia and Turkey, among other European nations, tried to establish dominance in the Persian Gulf region. Political and commercial reasons made it imperative to establish British supremacy in the Persian Gulf region. For this purpose, Lord Curzon visited the Persian Gulf region and took necessary steps to expand British dominance there.

Tibet Policy: Although Tibet was under China, it was originally an independent country. The Dalai Lama, the Buddhist religious leader, was the religious and state head of Tibet. In 1890 and 1893 AD, the British signed a trade agreement with Tibet, but Tibet continued to ignore it. During Lord Curzon's reign, Curzon became skeptical when the Dalai Lama initiated negotiations through a Buddhist Russian leader. He then sent a military mission to Tibet under the command of Colonel Younghusband with the permission of the British authorities. The Tibetans obstructed the mission, leading to a clash between the two. Younghusband defeated the Tibetans and captured their capital Lhasa.

As a result they were forced to make a treaty with the British. As a result of this war, the British got commercial rights along with war compensation. Then in 1907, a treaty was signed between England and Russia. According to this agreement, when England and Russia promised that no one would interfere in the internal affairs of Tibet, the fear of Russia in Tibet was removed and China's supremacy was established in Tibet.

Capture of Bera: Lord Curzon annexed the province of Berar to the British Empire in return for an annual stipend of Rs. Curzon's regime.

Cooperative Credit Societies: Lord Curzon's regime is particularly notable for internal reforms. He reviewed the mistakes of the previous regime and tried to solve them quickly. He established cooperative societies to protect farmers from exploitation by moneylenders for the betterment of farmers and agricultural systems.

Punjab Land Transfer Act: Lord Curzon enacted the Punjab Land Transfer Act in 1900 AD to protect farmers from exploitation by moneylenders in the matter of transfer or mortgage. Besides, he established the Government Agriculture Department and assigned the responsibility of its management to the Inspector General.

University Act: He was sympathetic to the education of Indians. For the expansion of higher education, Lord Curzon tried to bring it under government control by passing the University Act in 1904. Sir Ashutosh Mukherjee was strongly opposed to the increase in government authority over educational institutions.

Establishment of Department of Archaeology, Library and Cadet Corps: Lord Curzon established an Department of Archeology to preserve the ancient historical achievements of India and carry out extensive historical research. He founded the Imperial Library, India's largest library, in Calcutta. He won special acclaim by establishing the Imperial Cadet Corps to educate the sons of the native nobility in military education. Bengal division is a memorable event of his rule.

Partition of Bengal

Necessity of Partition of Bengal: Partition of Bengal is a significant event during the reign of Lord Curzon. Considering the administrative difficulties, in 1905 he divided the whole of Bangladesh i.e. the Bengal Presidency into two provinces. His Bengal Presidency consisted of parts of East Bengal, Bihar, Orissa, Madhya Pradesh and Assam. The administration of this vast province was vested in a Lieutenant Governor or Chhotalat. But due to the difficulty of communication, it was very difficult for one person to properly manage such a large province. Because it was impossible to properly manage the administration of the far eastern region from the capital Calcutta or to keep an eye on the happiness and sorrow of the people. That is why he felt the need for the division of Bengal for political purposes.

Movement against partition of Bengal: Lord Curzon divided Bengal into two parts to solve administrative difficulties and to introduce good governance. He merged North and East Bengal with Assam under the name 'East Bengal and Assam'

Formed a new province. Dhaka was established as the capital of this new province. On the other hand, another province called West Bengal was formed by combining the rest of Kolkata-centred Bengal with Bihar and Orissa. Thinking that the national unity of Bengalis will be destroyed as a result of this division of Bengal, Hindu leaders of that time like Surendranath Banerjee, Bipin Chandra Pal, Ashwini Kumar Dutta etc. started a vocal movement against it. Finally, when the Indian National Congress got involved in this movement, it took the form of a Hindu national movement. As a result, Lord Curzon's division of Bengal initiated a landmark event in the history of political movements in India.

The partition of Bengal was against the interests of the Hindus: not only because of administrative difficulties but also for the political, social and economic development of the neglected people of the eastern region, the partition of Bengal was absolutely necessary. Because the division of Bengal was against the interests of the Hindus from the beginning of the British rule in India: not only because of the administrative difficulties but also because of the considerable development of Bengal for the neglected people of the eastern region, but there was no improvement in the business, trade, education and communication system of the eastern region. Thus East Bengal and Assam came to be neglected and neglected. The socio-economic development of the people of the eastern region was hampered due to the long-term neglect, administrative deprivation and lack of effective planning by the western ruling group centered on Calcutta, the capital of the British regime.

Even though the economy of East Bengal is based on agriculture, no effective measures have been taken to improve the agriculture and farmers of the region. Even though jute, the main cash crop of Bengal, was grown exclusively in the eastern region, no need was felt to set up factories and mills here. Therefore, the majority of the Muslims of Bengal in the Bengal division saw the light of hope in the future and they withdrew from this movement of the Hindus.

Distress in East Bengal: Laxity from the administration is increasing day by day due to the dilapidation of the communication system. The people of the Muslim-majority eastern region continued to be oppressed and exploited in various ways. Taking advantage of the permanent land system defects, the money-grubbing Hindu zamindars and financiers used to brutally oppress the raiyats of rural Bengal. Furthermore, the communication, police and postal system of riverine East Bengal was completely underdeveloped. Taking advantage of this situation, a class of miscreants used to freely plunder, steal, and commit robbery in the eastern region. The lives and property of the local people were seriously threatened.

East Bengal's backwardness in education and Calcutta-centric education system: East Bengal was backward not only in social and economic fields but also in terms of education and culture. At that time 22 colleges and one university were established in the capital Calcutta alone. As a result West Bengal centered on Calcutta developed as a seat of education. Till then no similar measures were taken for the development of educational culture in East Bengal. This discriminatory regime between the two regions did not escape Lord Curzon's notice. He strongly believed that with the removal of administrative disorganization resulting from the partition of Bengal, the people of the eastern region would have the opportunity to achieve great economic, social and cultural development. Needless to say, the people of East Bengal and Assam benefited in every way as a result of the partition of Bengal Reaction of Hindus to the announcement of the partition of Bengal: As soon as the partition of Bengal was announced on July 5, 1905, there was a strong reaction among the Hindus. From the beginning they were opposed to the partition of Bengal. But this time after the partition of Bengal they called for a nationwide movement. The partition of Bengal led the Hindu leadership to realize that economic emancipation would come for the oppressed peasant-labourers of Muslim-majority East Bengal. They will get the opportunity to get education. A renaissance will begin among them and political consciousness will awaken. If they did not come to Calcutta one day, they would not have had education, litigation, office-court, business and even medical treatment. They will never come to Calcutta again. If offices-courts, schools-colleges, factories are established in Dhaka, the capital of the newly-formed province, and if newspapers start to circulate, their standard of living will improve. As a result, they can never be exploited again. So they embarked on a vigorous agitation against the division of Bengal.

Support of Muslims: Muslim leaders supported the partition of Bengal and congratulated the government wholeheartedly for it. As the new capital was built around Dhaka, Muslims saw a bright future in it. Sir Salimullah, the Muslim leader of Dhaka, played an important role in supporting the Bengal division.

Since the establishment of the Muslim League in Dhaka in 1906, Salimullah fully supported the partition of Bengal. Every year the annual session of the League condemns the anti-Bengal partition activities of Hindus. Besides, when Bhupendranath Dutt tried to raise the issue in the Memorial Council in 1910, the Muslim leaders of Bengal, Shamsul Huda, and Mazharul Haque of Bihar protested strongly. The new province gained the support of Muslims from different provinces of India. The Muslim press expressed joy at the support of the new province, and the Muslim Literary Society of Calcutta described it as a blessing and urged the Muslim people to co-operate with it. At this critical moment in East Bengal, Sir Salimullah continued his uncompromising struggle to protect the interests of Muslims and was supported by the emerging leader of Bengal, Fazlul Haque and the zamindar of Dhanbari, Nawab Ali Chowdhury. They gave speeches at various places in East Bengal, highlighting the rationale for the new province and trying to build public opinion in its support.

Canceling the partition of Bengal: Hindus became more angry as Muslims supported the partition of Bengal. They started a nationwide movement calling it an all-India problem. All Indian Congress actively participated in it. Soon, with the efforts of Congress and Hindu leaders, it took the form of a national movement and terrorist activities spread throughout the country. Assassinations, riots, various acts of sabotage, boycott of British goods etc. were the main programs of this movement. In history it is known as 'Swadeshi Andolan'. Soon their movement gained momentum.

Swadeshi Movement: After the Indian National Congress took over the leadership of the Bengal Partition movement, it soon turned into a movement against British rule. The Indian Congress took the leadership of the movement and announced a policy of boycott or boycott against the British. Krishnakumar Mitra, Surendranath Bandyopadhyay, Kali Prasanna Kavya Bisharad and Motilal Ghosh played the most significant role through their writings in making the policy of 'Boycott' or exclusion of British goods successful. In 1905, a public meeting at Bagerhat in Khulna adopted a 'boycott' resolution that British goods would be boycotted and no national festivals would be celebrated for the next six months until the partition of Bengal was cancelled. In the meeting held under the chairmanship of the Maharaj of Dinajpur on July 20 of the same year, an important resolution was adopted that until the goal of the movement is achieved, the resignation of all unpaid magistrates, the resignation of all members of the district board and municipalities and panchayats, and the observance of national mourning for the next 1 year. The student society of Bengal played an important role in the boycott movement. On August 7, 1905, a large public meeting was held in the town hall of Calcutta under the chairmanship of the Maharaj of Kashim Bazar. The students played a leading role in the rally and took the oath of boycott and swadeshi movement. The boycott proposal spread across the country and soon took the form of a Swadeshi movement. Students in villages and towns stopped buying Bilati salt and sugar and picketed in the city to request buyers not to buy Bilati products. At this time social boycott started against English citizens. Washermen, barbers, cobblers pledge not to cooperate with them.

The British government became helpless and tried to attract the Nawab of Dhaka Sir Salimullah and his party to the Muslims by applying the policy of division. Despite this, a section of the Muslim community participated in the Swadeshi movement to demand Indian national unity. On September 23, 1905, a meeting was held under the chairmanship of Abdul Rasul Sahib at Raja Bazar, Kolkata. The Muslims present in the meeting expressed their full support to the ideals and principles adopted by the Hindus for the welfare of the country.

Boycott and Swadeshi movement were not limited to political boundaries only. The contribution of Indian poets, writers and dramatists in its success is undeniable. They greatly inspired the people by staging patriotic songs and musicals and plays. Songs composed by Rabindranath Tagore- like Amar Sonar Bangla---- I love you which is still inspiring people with patriotism as the national anthem of this Bengal.

October 16, 1905 AD was scheduled as the date of implementation of the Partition of Bengal. In order to protect the integrity of Bengal, Hindu-Muslims of India observe Rakhi Bandhan Diwas on that day at the call of Rabindranath Tagore. In the first phase, the boycott movement was aimed at boycotting foreign goods, non-cooperation with the British. But from the month of October 1905, the Hindu-Muslims of India gradually adopted a strict policy against the British government. For example, boycott of foreign products, boycott of courts, boycott of schools and colleges and boycott of foreign rule. Although the movement was conducted under two different names, the main goal was the same. Therefore, from the month of October 1905, these two movements became more widespread under one name, Swadeshi movement.

Associations were formed in different regions and districts of the country to form public opinion in favor of the Swadeshi movement. Among the associations, 'Swadesh Bandhav' of Barisal, 'Vrati' of Faridpur and 'Sadhana' of Mymensingh are particularly notable. Among the associations, the greatest and most significant role was played by the 'Practice' of Dhaka. Most of the members of the societies were able to pull both members of the society into the party. Upper class people like- landlords, lawyers, teachers. Ashwini Kumar Dutta was their leader.

The main aim of the Swadeshi movement was—

(1) Injuring the textile industry by boycotting England's cotton;

(2) Revitalizing India's dormant industries.

(3) Another aim of the Swadeshi movement was to revive India with indigenous products. As a result, small cottage industries and large-scale industrial establishments were soon established in different parts of the country. With the spread of the Swadeshi movement, factories were established in various places for the production of textiles, soap, salt, sugar and leather goods.

As the intensity of the Bengal Partition movement was already felt, the Congress leaders were apprehensive about the future progress of the movement. They sent a delegation led by Gokhel to England to cancel the partition of Bengal. During the boycott and the Swadeshi movement, the Indian National Congress saw the emergence of soft and extremist parties on the basis of the Bengal Partition movement. Differences of opinion between them about the nature of the movement took shape.

Thinking about the future of the Swadeshi movement, the freedom-loving youth society of Bengal chose the path of armed revolution. “They expressed their determination to liberate Bengal through armed struggle. As a result, members of the Swadeshi Movement followed guerilla methods It spread all over Bangladesh. Swadeshi movement in Bengal took the form of armed movement in 1908 AD with the killing of English Magistrate King's Ford by Khudiram. Aurobindo Ghosh, Rabindra Ghosh and Bhupendranath Dutta were among those who gave leadership in the armed movement in Bengal. Pulin Bihari Das of Dhaka was the chief organizer of 'Anushilan'

Samiti. Members of this association could collect weapons and make bombs in various ways.

The members of Prakhya Samiti moved around in disguise and whenever they got the chance they always kept the government in terror through armed attacks and secret assassinations. Revolutionary leader Khudiram planned to kill Lt. Governor Fuller of Bengal with a bomb and was caught and sentenced to death by hanging. On the other hand, Praful Chaki, the killer of Magistrate King's Ford, committed suicide fearing to be caught. In 1912, a secret bomb-making factory was set up in Calcutta and in the same year Lord Harding was bombed as per the plan of the revolutionary Rambihari Bose, who luckily escaped with his life. The British government announced a reward of around one lakh rupees for the arrest of the attacker.

During the First World War, many revolutionary leaders of Bangladesh such as Bagha Jatin, Narendranath Bhattacharya and Dr. Jadugopal Mukhopadhyay tried to procure weapons secretly in various ways. When the British government came to know about their secret weapons collection and the government moved to arrest them, a friendly war ensued. At this time a revolutionary leader named Chittapriya was martyred. On the other hand, three revolutionary leaders including Bagha Jatin were seriously injured and arrested by the police. Bagha Jatin died while in custody and two others were executed by hanging. Even then, the armed revolution of the revolutionaries did not stop. On January 30, 1916, they killed Basant Chattopadhyay, Deputy Superintendent of Police of Bhavanipur. In the context of such incidents, the government arrested many revolutionaries. In 1922, when Gandhiji announced the withdrawal of the Non-Cooperation Movement, the number of tortures and arrests of the revolutionaries by the British government increased manifold. In 1924, when the government issued the Bengal Ordinance, many revolutionaries were imprisoned. As a result, the terrorist activities of the revolutionaries were somewhat reduced.

In 1930, when Gandhiji declared civil disobedience program, the terrorist activities of the revolutionaries increased to a large extent. The revolutionaries kept the British Government in Bengal constantly alarmed and disturbed by their terrorist activities. Master Da Surya Sen was one such daring young leader of Chittagong, who despised the fear of death to achieve the desired goal of the armed youth of Bengal and repeatedly fought against the government. He built a revolutionary organization with the help of Sen, Nagen Sen, similar to Ambika Chakraborty in his efforts. To free Chittagong from the misrule of the British government, he repeatedly attacked government institutions and caused great damage. Not only that, Master Da Surya Sen along with his team declared war against the government by looting the government's arms store in Chittagong.

Against such daring actions of Surya Sen Master Dar, the British government appointed a huge army and a part of the British army fought with the revolutionaries in Jalalabad hill. Many young revolutionaries were killed here in the frontline, many fled to the villages to hide and many were captured by the British army and thrown in jail. The prisoners were sentenced to death by hanging after severe punishment. There were many women fighters among the revolutionaries. Kalpana Dutta and Pritilata were among them. Pritilata represents extreme bravery among women warriors. Before being captured by the British government, he committed suicide by drinking poison.

Finally, Dadabhai Naoroji declared that the goal of the Indian people's struggle was to achieve Swaraj in order to settle the differences between moderates and extremists.

The political objectives of the Swadeshi movement did not succeed as the agitators adopted a different course of action at the instigation of the extremist leaders. Agitators started terrorist activities across the country to bring down the British government. The revolutionaries continued to engage in arson, looting and political assassinations in various places. In this terrorist activity Khudiram and Prafulla Chaki sacrificed their lives in a failed attempt to kill Baralat of Bengal. Despite the sabotaging activities of compatriots and terrorists at various places, the British government remained steadfast in its policy. As a result, the movement of terrorists soon took shape all over the country.

Lord Curzon resigned due to disagreements with senior commander Kitchener over the partition of Bengal. Then the new Viceroy Lord Hardinge arrived in India and tried to satisfy both. Lord Hardinge annulled the partition of Bengal in 1911 at the inauguration of George V at the Delhi court. In this declaration, Salimullah's efforts included the proposal to establish a university in Dhaka for the higher education of the people of East Bengal and the central capital of India was shifted from Calcutta to Delhi.

Sir Syed Ahmad Khan and Aligarh Movement

Introduction: Sir Syed Ahmad Khan, the father of the Aligarh movement, was born in 1817 and started his early life as a trusted servant of the British government. During the Great Revolt of 1857, he was appointed as Sadar Amin in Bijapur. He ended his career as a sub-judge. He was also a member of the Legislative Council Hunter Commission and the Public Civil Service Commission of India. He was strongly loyal to the British during the Great Rebellion and was subsequently knighted by the British Government in 1888.

Taking a vow for the overall welfare of Muslims: Sir Syed Ahmad Khan took a vow for the overall welfare of the Muslim community instead of taking privileges from the British government for personal interest. The deplorable condition of the Muslim community at that time made Syed Ahmad very sad. He realized that one of the reasons for their plight was the religious fanaticism of Muslims and their hatred of western education. The Muslim community was hostile to the British for the downfall of the Mughal Empire and thus sympathized with the Wahhabis and the Great Revolt. From the beginning of the British rule, the Muslims avoided all relations with them. At this time, their hatred towards English education and western culture created deep disgust. The British government adopted a policy of Hindu appeasement and denied all privileges to the Muslims, targeting the hostile attitude of the Muslims. Hindus welcomed the British government, adopted European education and culture, progressed on the path of progress and occupied the highest positions of administration. Hindus advanced in all spheres at state and social level. On the other hand, the Muslims, not receiving English education and culture and being averse to the British, fell behind in all respects. After the Great Mutiny, the British government became suspicious of Muslim loyalty. As a result, the political influence and prestige of the Muslims was completely destroyed. The appearance of Sir Syed Ahmad Khan in the dire straits of the Muslim community is truly astonishing Efforts to Improve mutual relations: Syed Ahmad tried to establish harmony between the British government and the Muslim community and took care to spread modern education among the Muslims. He tried to convince the Muslims that their progress depended solely on cooperation and loyalty with the British.

On the other hand, he assured the government of the loyalty of the Muslims. He tried to convince the British that Islam had no reason to declare jihad against the British.

Attempts to gain government loyalty: Syed Ahmad's appeal to the British government did not fail. Because the Hindus had already received western education and western liberal moral ideas and gradually became inspired with national consciousness, which was perceived as anti-government and revolutionary attitude by the British government. So the government adopted Syed Ahmad's plan and took care to win the sympathy of the Muslims against the Hindus.

The movement started by Sir Syed Ahmad to spread progressive ideas in all political, social and cultural fields among the Muslims is known as 'Aligarh Movement'. Sir Syed Ahmad did not stop at improving the relations between the British government and the Muslims. He realized that the underdeveloped and backward Muslims were unable to compete with the advanced Hindu community in Western education and that till the time the Muslims were advanced in Western education, all the privileges of the state would be enjoyed exclusively by the Hindus. So he considered western education through English language as the right basis for progress.

Therefore, he took initiative in spreading western education and western ideas to Muslims. In 1864 he established the English School in Gazipur. He founded an organization called 'Vijnyan Samiti' to translate the valuable books written in English into Urdu and distribute them among the Muslims.

Establishment of Anglo-Oriental College at Aligarh: Syed Ahmad first published a magazine called Tahjib-ul-Akhlaq to dispel the fear of western education among Muslims. He also formed an organization called "Committee for Advancement Test of Learning". The committee recommended a distinct system for the introduction of western education among Muslims. The recommendation also called for the establishment of a separate college for Muslims. The Government of India supported Syed Ahmed's plan and promised financial assistance. But a section of conservative Muslims strongly opposed the spread of Western education among elite Muslims. Finally, he established the Anglo-Oriental College at Aligarh on the model of Oxford and Cambridge universities. Under the supervision of an English principal, the college provides arts and science education. The contribution of this college in inculcating progressive attitude among Muslim students is undeniable. Syed Ahmad established another organization called 'Mohammedan Educational Conference' to spread Western liberal ideas among Muslims. In fact, Syed Ahmad started the renaissance among Muslims. Thus he started the Aligarh movement.

Contribution of Aligarh to the Development of Muslim Consciousness: The Aligarh movement greatly helped in developing political consciousness among Muslims. At one time Syed Ahmad worked together with the Hindus in Indian politics and the movement related to the Ilbert Bill. He was also in favor of taking the Civil Service Examination in India like in England. At this time Muslim leaders tried to isolate the Muslim community from Hindu influence and prestige. But in this case, the principal of Mohammedan Anglo-Oriental College Mr. Theodore Beck played a significant role in the progress of Muslims.

Thoughts of Syed Ahmad: Despite being a progressive, educationalist and social reformer, Syed Ahmad became a radical fanatic in politics in his later life. In 1880 he declared that the political interests of Hindus and Muslims were not identical but opposed. He preached total loyalty to British rule. When the Indian National Congress was founded in 1885, he opposed it and decided to establish an organization loyal to British rule with the help of Raja Shiva Prasad of Varanasi. He believed that if the British left India, the Hindu majority would rule over the Muslim minority. He described the Congress movement as an 'unarmed civil war' and ordered Muslims to stay away from the Congress. He established three organizations namely Educational Congress, United Indian Patriotic Association against the National Congress. It is true that Syed Ahmad made the Muslims politically conscious but he failed to completely alienate them from the Congress movement.

Syed Ahmad as a reformer: Sir Syed Ahmad was one of the Muslim reformers. He undertook the task of reconciling Islam with modern science and thought. He attempted to interpret the Qur'an from the perspective of contemporary science and logic as the accepted ideal of Al-Qur'an. Throughout his life he continued to struggle against blind faith in traditions, traditional practices, ignorance and irrationality. He laid special importance on the independent thinking of people. In his words "So long as freedom of thought is not developed, there can be no civilized life." He warned Muslims against bigotry and all kinds of narrow-mindedness and emphasized on Western education and cultural practices. He advised the Muslims to discard the medieval manners and thoughts. He strongly condemned the veil among Muslim women and emphasized the importance of women's education. He strongly criticized social vices such as unregulated marriages and voluntary divorces.

Nawab Abdul Latif

After the defeat in the rebellion of 1857, the mindset of the Muslims changed. Nawab Abdul Latif and Ameer Ali took new programs to change the Muslim society. Among them, Syed Amir Ali was the most progressive thinker. He devoted himself to a political organization for Muslims and a scientific analysis of religion. Their activities started a renaissance among the Muslims of Bengal and with the spread of education, they gradually became aware of their rights.

Nawab Abdul Latif was born in Faridpur in 1828. At the beginning of his educational career he acquired English education from Calcutta Madrasa. Then he joined Dhaka Collegiate School as a teacher. There After teaching for some time, he joined Calcutta Madrasa as a professor of English and Arabic in 1848. The following year he joined government service as a Deputy Magistrate. Due to his outstanding efficiency, he was promoted as the Presidency Magistrate of Calcutta in 1877. Nawab Abdul Latif proved his competence by serving in many responsible positions in his career. He retired from government service in 1884. Nawab Abdul Latif was conferred the title of Khan Bahadur and later Nawab by the British Government in recognition of his efficiency.

After retiring from service, Abdul Latif was elected a member of the Bengal Legislative Council in 1862 from among the Muslims. Since then, the welfare and protection of the interests of the Muslim society became one of the vows of his life. He realized in his progressive thinking that the failure to keep pace with the times, the rejection of English education and the policy of non-cooperation with the government were the main reasons for the decline of Muslims.

So he tried to reawaken Muslims in the light of modern education. For this purpose, in 1852, he convened the Nikhil Bharat Essay Competition entitled 'Efforts of Muslim Students in English Education'. His essay competition created great enthusiasm and enthusiasm among the Muslim students at that time. With the active efforts of Nawab Abdul Latif, the Anglo-Persian Department was opened in Calcutta Madrasa. In 1873, he founded the Muslim Literary Society in Calcutta and inspired Muslims with progressive ideas.

Nawab Abdul Latif did not forget the persecution of Muslims after the Great Revolt of 1857, so he kept himself away from political discussions and maintained cordial relations with the British government. He invited Maulana Keramat Ali of Jaunpur to address his association to dispel Muslim misconceptions about the British government. He was able to refute the idea of British rule 'Darul Harb' Muslims through various arguments.

Abdul Latif's contribution to modernizing Muslims and spreading modern education in the Indian subcontinent cannot be denied. In 1872, he established several Madrasahs in different regions with the help of government funds. He coordinated modern education with religious education in all these madrasas. He was a full supporter of government policy in spreading modern education. Through his efforts, the government of that time opened the way of education for all by abolishing caste system and conservatism of Hindu colleges. But in 1853 Bethune Sahib, president of the Education Council, converted the Calcutta Hindu College into the Presidency College after being dismayed by the activities of some Hindu leaders. Nawab Abdul Latif paved the way for the spread of education in Bangladesh by collecting aid for Muslim students.

Finally, there is no doubt that Nawab Abdul Latif played an important role in spreading modern education among the Muslims of Bengal.

Syed Ameer Ali

The contribution of Syed Amir Ali, like Nawab Abdul Latif, to the renaissance of the superstitious Muslim society of Bengal in the second half of the 19th century is undeniable. He was born in 1849 in a noble Shia family in Hooghly during the troubled times of the Muslims of Bengal. 8 years after his birth, the great calamity of 1857 befell the Indian Muslims due to their political short-sightedness and incapacity for western education. As a result, the fortunes of Muslims fell to the lowest level compared to other communities of the subcontinent and had to face heavy losses. Noticing the plight of Bengali and Indian Muslims, Syed Amir Ali realized the importance of western education like Syed Ahmad Khan and Abdul Latif.

Syed Amir Ali was a progressive thinker from childhood. Noticing the decline of the Muslim society in the subcontinent at that time, he made himself well educated in Islamic and Western education. In 1867, Syed Amir Ali obtained MA degree and later BL degree from Calcutta University. Then he went abroad for higher education. In 1873, he passed the bar from Lincoln's Inn, returned home and joined the Calcutta High Court as a barrister. He gained fame within a short time as a distinguished lawyer.

Syed Ameer Ali adorned many responsible positions in life due to his personal talent and hard work. He was also a professor of law at Calcutta University, a Presidency Magistrate and a member of the Bengal Legislative Council from 1878-1883. A learned personality and a shrewd lawyer, he graced the post of adviser to the Viceroy and was later appointed a judge of the Calcutta High Court. Syed Amir Ali was the first Indian to be appointed a member of the British Privy Council on his own merit and held the position for life.

Amir Ali was not only a learned jurist. He tried to reform society as a powerful writer, visionary thinker and progressive politician to change the social backwardness and outdated attitudes of Muslims. Like Syed Ahmad Khan and Nawab Abdul Latif, he believed in western education and co-operation with the government, but he had no interest in madrasa education. So he laid special importance on the development of modern education and social reform among Muslims. The idea that participating in Indian politics like Abdul Latif would hinder the spread of education and overall progress of Muslims was irrelevant to him. He believed in the political renaissance of Muslims by using his own ideals and programs to change the prevailing trends of the society at that time. That is why he established the Central National Mohammedan Association in Calcutta in 1877 to develop the political consciousness of Muslims and to establish mutual unity and to present just demands to the government in a systematic way. The Central Mohammedan Association founded by Syed Amir Ali played an important role in the advancement of the educational and political movement of Indian Muslims. In 1882, the association requested the Viceroy Lord Ripon to consider the issue of Muslim education separately. At this time, Amir Ali highlighted the reasons for the backwardness of Muslims and its remedies through his writings in various newspapers. Finally in 1886 his relentless efforts were successful and in 1887 he was appointed by the government as C. I. E was awarded the title. He left a scholarly contribution to the scientific analysis and propagation of principles of Islam. Among his great works, The Spirit of Islam and A Short History of the Saracens have become famous among the reading community.

Syed Amir Ali was a simple and liberal person. The objective of the association founded by him was to create harmony among all the communities of the subcontinent, Muslims and non-Muslims. But after the partition of Bengal in 1905, the Muslim League was established in 1906 to target the extreme Hindu nationalism policies of the Indian National Congress. At that time Syed Amir Ali was staying in London and from there he welcomed the establishment of Muslim League. After founding the Muslim League, he led independent elections for Indian Muslims in London. It is undeniable that the seeds of a future independent homeland lay in the independent election of the Muslims. After returning home, he was elected president of the All India Muslim League in 1912. He breathed his last in London in 1928.

Indian National Congress (1885 AD)

The establishment of the Indian National Congress in 1885 was a landmark event in the political life of India. For the next twenty years after its establishment, the National Congress was able to establish a common ideology, gaining deep prestige and influence in the political arena of India. Scholars have different opinions about its origins, but the plan to form the Indian National Congress was adopted when the session of the Indian National Conference convened by Surendranath Banerjee was held in Calcutta in 1885. The first session of the Indian National Congress was held in Bombay a day after the National Conference held in Calcutta. So it can be said that the National Conference held in Calcutta was the model of the Indian National Congress without any doubt.

English bureaucrat Allan Octavian Hume felt the need to form a political institution to guide the thinking and political aspirations of the educated middle class of India in a democratic way. Then in 1885, the Indian National Congress was established under the patronage of Lord Dufferin and with the efforts of Allan Octavian Hume and some educated and influential Indian leaders. The first president and general secretary of the Congress were elected respectively the famous leader of Bengal Barrister Umesh Chandra Banerjee and the retired Englishman I. C. S. Allan Octavian Hume. Allan Octavian Hume, the founding secretary of the Congress, held the post of general secretary for over 25 years. At first the policy of the Congress was to fulfill political aspirations by presenting demands in a dictatorial manner to the British rulers.

Origin of the National Congress: Hume's motives and ideals at the origin of the formation of the Indian National Congress were completely different. At that time, as the general discontent among the people of different parts of India was gradually increasing, Hume realized the danger of the British Empire in India. The economic plight of the Indian people and the attitude of the educated community and the possibility that India would endanger the security of the British Empire worried Hume. From an administrative point of view Hume felt the need to appease Indian discontent. In 1883, Hume published an open letter to Calcutta University graduates advising them to form a permanent organization for political, social, mental and moral encouragement.

He also assured government support to such organizations. Lord Dufferin, then Lord Chancellor of India, felt the need for a suitable organization to express the views and intentions of the people of India for the convenience of governance. So he readily agreed to Hume's proposal and encouraged him.

Hume formed an association called the Indian National Union and convened a national conference. Regarding the purpose of forming the National Congress, Hume said that there was a conspiracy against the British rule in India at that time. He felt the need to form the Congress so that the educated community of India would not join any such revolution. Hume described the Congress as a 'safety valve' for the interests of the British government and envisioned it as a check against destructive forces in India. It must be admitted that Hume wanted to reflect the aspirations of the people of India by forming such an all-India organization. As a result of his tireless work, the National Congress became a representative institution.

The first session of the National Congress convened by Hume was held in Bombay on 25 December 1885 under the chairmanship of Barrister Umesh Chandra Banerjee. 72 delegates from different states of India attended the session. Umesh Chandra Banerjee in his speech announced the four main objectives of the Congress.

(1) To engage in the service of the country in the various provinces of India.

There is mutual recognition and camaraderie between them

(2) To pave the way for greater national unity by removing the narrowness of caste, religion and provincialism through mutual harmony.

(3) Social reforms and solution of problems through dialogue among educated people and

(4) Adopt next year's program for political progress. At the end of the session, a resolution containing nine recommendations was adopted to be forwarded to the government. Notable among the recommendations are—

(1) to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the administration of India,(2)Abolition of the Consultative Council of the Secretary of India, (3) admission of elected Indian members to the Central Legislature (4) reduction of expenditure on the Indian military sector and (5) provision of simultaneous examinations in India and England for the appointment of high-ranking civil servants. In its first session, the conference was named 'National Congress of India'.

The resolutions of the first session of the Congress increased the political consciousness of the educated masses of India and created political enthusiasm throughout the country. Gradually new life was infused into the Congress and the progressive political doctrine of Bengal was established in the Congress. The second session of the Congress was held in Calcutta under the presidency of Dadabhai Naoroji. Several resolutions were adopted in this session and the Government's attention was drawn to the grievances of the people of India.

Initially the Congress tried to extract demands from loyalists to the government. But from 1897 gradually Congress leaders and workers began to express their views against the British government. Congress leaders, especially those in Bengal and Maharashtra, became active in revolutionary programs demanding the repeal of the Indian Act and the reform and expansion of the central provincial legislatures.

Bengal Congress leader Bipin Chandra Pal, Motilal Ghosh, Punjab leader Lal Lajpat Roy and Maharashtra leader Balgangadhar Tilak were extremist revolutionary Congress leaders. Through the efforts of Balgangadhar Tilak, the Congress gradually became influenced by Hindu nationalist ideas and communal consciousness rose to the fore in the Congress. As a result, the British government became hostile towards the Congress.

Shimla deputation and independent elections:

After Lord Curzon's departure from India, Lord Minto was appointed Viceroy of British India. The Simla deputation is an important event in the political history of Muslims during his rule. Through this deputation, the Indian Muslims got an opportunity to present their rights and demands to the British government.

In 1906, to appease the anti-partition Hindu community, Lord Morley, the Secretary of India, in a speech to the British Parliament, hinted at making the composition of the Legislative Council of India more representative. Morley's prescient speech made the Muslims of India anxious about their future. Because the Indian Council Act of 1892 could not satisfy the Muslims. So they formed a delegation led by Aligarh Muslim leader Muhsin ul-Mulk to meet Barlat and drafted a memorandum. Then His Excellency Aga Khan was given the leadership of this delegation. On 1 October 1906, a delegation of 35 eminent men of Muslim India, led by the Aga Khan, met the Viceroy of British India, Barlat Minto, in Shimla and presented a memorandum on the interests of Muslims. In view of the said demand in the memorandum given by the Muslim leaders, Baralat assured that the political rights and interests of the Muslims would be protected if governance reforms were introduced in India. This is known as the famous Shimla Deputation. One of the demands of the Shimla deputation was independent or separate elections for Muslims. The success of the Shimla deputation was proved when Morley-Minto's demand for independent or separate elections in 1909 was accepted.

Muslim League

When the Indian National Congress was born in 1885, Sir Syed Ahmad advised Muslims to stay away from this organization. The communal activities of a number of Congress leaders, especially Balgangadhar Tilak's radical Hindu nationalist ideology, made Muslims skeptical about the Congress's intentions. After the partition of Bengal in 1905, as the Hindu community started a mass movement to abolish it, the Muslim leaders also felt the need to organize themselves. On October 1, 1906, a powerful Muslim delegation led by the Aga Khan at Shimla approached Lord Minto with a demand for separate elections, which he accepted in principle. As a result, the Muslim leaders became greatly encouraged. At the end of December 1906, leaders present at the Nikhil Bharat Muslim Education Conference in Dhaka discussed the question of a political organization. On the initiative of Sir Salimullah, a domestic discussion was held on December 30, 1906 at Shahbagh in Dhaka under the chairmanship of Nawab Vikar-ul-Mulk. In this domestic discussion meeting, Mohsin-ul-Mulk proposed the formation of a political party called 'Muslim League' and Hakim Ajmal Khan supported it. Nawab Vikar-ul-Mulk and Mohsin-ul-Mulk were entrusted with the task of drafting the constitution of the Muslim League.

The great poets Allama Iqbal, Muhammad Ali Jinnah and Taibji were not invited to attend this historic conference in Dhaka. When Nawab Mohsin ul-Mulk died in 1907, Nawab Vikar-ul-Mulk alone completed the work of drafting the constitution of the Muslim League. Aga Khan was the permanent president of this organization from 1907 to 1912. At that time, the office of the Muslim League was initially located in Aligarh and later in Lucknow.

Aims and objectives of the Muslim League:

At the time of the birth of the 'Muslim League' in Dhaka on 30th December 1906, its three aims or objectives were determined

They are as follows:

1. To increase the loyalty of Indian Muslims to the British Government and to remove the misperceptions of the Muslim people with the Government about the policies and activities of the Government.
2. To humbly submit to the Government the needs and aspirations of the Indian Muslim people for the preservation and advancement of their rights and interests.
3. In addition to fulfilling the above two objectives, to continue the activities of this organization to remove obstacles in the way of harmony and harmony of the Muslim people with other Indian communities.

Morley-Minto Reforms – 1909 AD.

After the Great Mutiny of 1857 AD, the British government adopted a somewhat flexible policy reflecting the aspirations of the Indian people. As a result, some steps are taken to meet the demands of people's autonomy through the laws made by the government from time to time. But later on Lord Curzon's autocratic and bureaucratic mindset got the Indian people angry. Lord Curzon always considered the Indian people unfit for state work. Due to such bureaucratic attitude of the British rulers, the Indian people started the boycott or boycott of foreign goods movement and the Swadeshi movement to demand autonomy. In 1906, the Muslim League under the leadership of Aga Khan presented to Lord Minto the demand for separate elections for Muslims. The then Indian Secretary Lord Morley and Minto's Reform Act is a significant event in the governance movement of the Indian subcontinent with various problems and to solve the problems. The Indian Council of Managers Act was passed in the British Parliament in 1909 AD for their efforts to administer the proper governance of India. This Governing Council Act is known as the Morley-Minto Reform Act. The clauses or features of this Act are mentioned below:

First, the Morley-Minto Reforms Act increased the constitution and membership of India's central and provincial governing bodies and introduced the principle of election of members for the first time in the country. Satyendra Prasanna Singh was the first in India to be appointed as a member of the Baralat Executive Council. The number of members of the Executive Council of the Governor of Madras and Bombay was increased to four.

Secondly, an executive council was formed to manage the governance of Bangladesh. Although this Act did not provide for the appointment of any Indian members to the Provincial Executive Councils, Kishori Lal Goswami A member was appointed to the Executive Council of Bengal.

Thirdly, one of the features of this Act is that it introduces principles of composition and distribution of powers between the Central and Provincial Legislatures. The membership of the Central Management Board was increased from 16 to 60 members. 28 government members, 27 private members and 5 members nominated by the government. Private members will be elected. But if the nominated members joined on behalf of the government, the government would get the majority of the meeting. But even if the government party was defeated in the election, this defeat could have been prevented by the special provisions of the constitution.

Fourthly, as the demand for separate elections of Muslims was recognized in this Act, the demand for communal representation was recognized.

Fifthly, the Act empowers the Legislature to raise budget proposals and discuss matters of public interest. However, if the proposals are not satisfactory, the power to ignore them is vested in the hands of the government.

Therefore, it can be seen that in this reform law system, no system has been made to manage the government with the priority of public opinion. This system did not fulfill the mass movement or the political aspirations of anyone. However, the system increased the membership of the Provincial Executive Council and accepted the demand for independent or separate elections for Muslims. The system of accepting an Indian member in the governing council of Barlat was also recognized in this reform act.

Lucknow Treaty-1916

The Morley-Minto Reform Act failed to fulfill the political aspirations of the people of the Indian subcontinent. As a result, the Indian nationalist movement became more vocal in its demand for autonomy. Meanwhile, Indian Muslims became bitterly resentful of the British Raj's role against Turkey in the Partition of Bengal and the Balkan Wars. Because the Muslims believed that the Caliph of Turkey was a religious master and guide of the whole Muslim world. When the First World War started in 1914, the Indian Muslims remained loyal to the British government and took up arms against Germany and Turkey to achieve their political goals. But when the British government broke its promise to the Indian Muslims and dismembered the Turkish Empire, the Muslims became very angry. As a result, they also started organizing themselves with the National Congress to demand autonomy against the British. Maulana Mohammad Ali, Maulana Shawkat Ali, Maulana Abul Kalam Azad and other influential Muslim leaders led the anti-British autonomy movement in India. At this time the Indian Muslims were further enraged when the demand to convert the Aligarh College into a university was rejected by the British government. In the wake of these events, the idea took root among the liberal leaders of the Indian Muslim League that it was absolutely necessary for Indian Hindu-Muslims to unite to achieve future demands. In April 1913, in the session of the Bangladesh Provincial Muslim League in Dhaka, A. K. Fazlul Haque of the British government's anti-Muslim policy Strongly opposed and later joined the Indian National Congress. Later on. K. Fazlul Haque Barrister Abdur Rasool and other people's thinking and spirit of cooperation resulted in great political unity and atmosphere of cooperation between the Hindus and Muslims of India. Muhammad Ali Jinnah, a prominent Congress leader, joined the Muslim League at the sixth session of the Muslim League in Lucknow in 1913. After that, the leaders of both the organizations took plans for a joint program in the future with the aim of increasing amity and harmony between the Congress-Muslim League leaders. In 1916, 19 Hindu-Muslim members of the Central Managing Council submitted a memorandum to the British government proposing a plan of governance. Then the ninth annual conference of Congress-Muslim League was held in Lucknow on 29 and 30 December 1916. In this conference, Barrister Abdur Rasool proposed a joint governance plan and it was unanimously accepted. A similar proposal was also adopted in the Congress session. Thus the Lucknow Agreement is a wonderful document of Hindu-Muslim harmony and understanding. The main aspects of this agreement are as follows:

1. As a result of this agreement, it was decided that the number of seats for Muslims in the Central Legislature would be one-third of the total number of elected seats.
2. In Muslim majority provinces, Muslim seats will be higher than their numerical ratio. On the other hand, in Muslim majority provinces like Bengal, their seats will be proportionally less.
3. Separate elections will continue.
4. If three-fourths of the members of any religion in a legislative assembly oppose any law affecting the interests of that religion, it shall be repealed.

The Lucknow Pact created a great opportunity for reconciliation between Hindus and Muslims. The two rival parties, the Congress and the Muslim League, expressed their determination to work together for the autonomy of the subcontinent through mutual recognition. However, due to various reasons, this agreement could not reach the target in the following days

Rowlatt Act-1918

First, during the World War, the British government adopted several repressive policies to counter the terrorist movement in India and the movement to cancel the partition of Bengal. During the war, the British government introduced Emergency Acts and Special Powers Acts to suppress terrorist activities in India when they reached their peak. Apart from this, the Wartime Defense of India Act is also a particularly noteworthy aspect. Subsequently, the government was quick to adopt more stringent measures to suppress revolutionary movements and mass discontent in post-war India. Not only this, the Indian government introduced the infamous and reactionary Rowlatt Act in 1918 to suppress all forms of Indian political movement.

The Act provided for the suppression of the press and the imprisonment and deportation of any person without trial. Muhammad Ali Jinnah and Mazhar ul-Haq resigned as members of the Legislative Assembly in protest against the Act. Jinnah commented that the ideals of humanity had been destroyed by this law. The Rowlatt Act also greatly revolted Gandhiji and he regarded the British Empire as the devil's arena. The protest against the Rowlatt Act culminated in the Jallianwala Bagh massacre. The government opened fire and killed some people during peaceful processions and protests against the infamous Rowlatt Act in Punjab. In protest against this, on April 13, 10,000 people of Amritsar met in a protest meeting in a park in Jallianwala Bagh of the city. General Dyer ordered his troops to open fire without warning the assembled people. General Dyer's army massacred the unarmed crowd for about 10 minutes. As a result, 379 people were killed on the spot and 1200 people were injured. When the story of the brutal Jallianwala Bagh massacre spread, people in various parts of India became enraged and started riots, arson and terrorist activities in various places.

Rule of India Act of 1919 or Montague Chelmsford Reforms Act, 1919

Introduction: The Russian Socialist Revolution of 1917 AD encouraged the Indian people. In view of the above incident, the Secretary of India Mr. Edwin Montagu assured the Indian people that "the people of India will be progressively involved in governance so that responsible governance can be established."

Sections of the Indian Government Act in 1919 AD:

Dual Rule: One of the features of the Government of India Act of 1919 was that it divided the provincial affairs into reserved and devolved and introduced dual rule in the provinces. The provincial governor, through his executive council, managed reserved affairs such as justice, police, irrigation, forests, agricultural development, publishing, district and land administration. A member of the Indian Civil Service was nominated to the Governor's Executive Council.

Devolved matters such as self-government, public health, education, public works, communications, agriculture, fisheries, cooperatives, etc. were administered on the advice of the provincial cabinet. The Ministers were responsible to the Provincial Legislature. Their activities depended on the satisfaction of the Legislative Council.

Distribution of Powers: The Government of India Act, 1919 entrusted the central government with the responsibility of managing foreign affairs, national defence, communications, and currency. On the other hand, the responsibility of managing law and order, justice, health, education, cooperatives etc. is entrusted to the provincial government.

Governor's Executive Council: This Act constituted an Executive Council consisting of seven members to assist the Governor General. It was decided that there will be three Indian members in the said council.

Central Legislature: The Government of India Act of 1919 divided the Central Legislature into two chambers. Namely – Upper House is called Rashtriya Sabha and Lower House is called Managerial Sabha. Of the 60 members of the National Assembly, 33 will be elected and the remaining 27 nominated by the Governor General. The total number of members of the lower house is 145 people. Out of them 103 members will be elected and remaining 42 members will be nominated by the Governor General.

Powers of the Central Legislature: This Act vests the legislative power of the whole of India in the Central Legislature. However, it was decided that the Central Legislature would not have the power to repeal or amend any law made by the British Parliament. No bill could be introduced in the Legislature by any member without the prior permission of the Governor-General, relating to any measures taken by the Governor-General, establishing diplomatic relations with foreign countries, or measures taken by the British Government in relation to native states. The Governor General could suspend or cancel the discussion of any bill. The Governor General could issue an ordinance if there were any reasons for breach of peace in the country. Governor General he could convene or adjourn the session of the legislature and dissolve any chamber of the legislature.

Method of Election: This Act accepts the demand for separate elections for different communities for the election of members of the Legislative Assembly. As a result, Muslims, Sikhs, Anglo-Indians each got the opportunity of individual representation.

Powers of Provincial Government: This Act gives unlimited powers to the Provincial Governor. The provincial governor could rule by law ignoring the advice of the executive council and the cabinet.

Creation of the post of High Commissioner: The Government of India Act created the post of High Commissioner to provide facilities for Indian students studying in England and to deal with trade related matters. He was appointed by the Governor General for 5 years.

Powers of the British Raj: This act increased the power of the British Raj. The British monarch could veto any law made by the central or provincial legislatures.

Constitution of Public Service Commission: This Act constituted a Public Service Commission consisting of a Chairman and five other members. The Commission was appointed by the Secretary of India for a term of five years and regulated recruitment and recruitment rules.

Enhancement of powers of the Secretary of India: The powers of the Secretary of India are further enhanced by this Act. He controlled and managed the Governor General of India and the members of the Executive Council. His office was established at White Hall in England. He was called the "Great Mughal of the White Hall" for his dominance and unlimited power over the governance of India. was called

It can be concluded that the Government of India Act, 1919 vested limited powers in the hands of elected representatives of the people in matters of governance. But if it is judged as a democratic system, the central and provincial administrations can be seen to have considerable flaws in this law. First, the Act freed the Executive Council from the control of the Legislature. Secondly, the provincial administration was divided into reserved and devolved, i.e. vested powers on the one hand and non-responsible powers on the other. As a result, obstacles are created in the smooth administration of governance and administrative efficiency is undermined.

Khilafat Movement and Non-Cooperation Movement (1919-1922)

The origin of the name Khilafat from the Muslim world Khulafaye Rashedin, that is, the expansion of the power related to the rule of the Caliph. Not only that, Muslims believed that the Caliph was the religious master and guide of the Muslim world. Therefore, the caliphate is a sacred institution for Muslims and the person holding the position is a caliph and a respected figure in the Muslim world. It was natural for the Muslims of the Indian subcontinent to have respect for Turkey as the Sultan of Turkey became the 'Khalifa'. When World War I broke out in 1914, Türkiye joined Germany against England. On the other hand, the Indian Muslims remained loyal to the British government and took up arms against Germany and Turkey to achieve their own political interests. But the Indian Muslims later disagreed with the inflexible attitude of the British rule towards Turkey. The British government became suspicious of the cooperation and loyalty of Indian Muslims and imprisoned Maulana Muhammad Ali, Maulana Shawkat Ali, Maulana Abul Kalam Azad and other Muslim leaders. As a result of such repressive policies of the British government, the Indian Muslims became very angry and they started a strong movement in the Indian subcontinent against the British government. Noticing the ferocity of the Indian Muslim anti-British movement and realizing the strong attraction and respect Muslims had for the Turkish Caliphate, British Prime Minister Lloyd George assured that the Turkish Empire and Caliphate would be kept intact after the war. In addition, after the war, the British government also assured to accept the demand of Indians for autonomy.

The First World War ended in 1918. But after the war, Muslims noted with deep indignation that the British government dealt a heavy blow to the Turkish Empire by the Treaty of Sèvres in 1920. By forcing Turkey to sign a humiliating treaty, the British government divided the Turkish Empire between the European powers. The Muslims were deeply shocked by this and the entire Muslim world became angry with the British government. The Muslims of the Indian subcontinent were also outraged by such overbearing behavior of the British government and they prepared for an all-out movement against the government. In view of such situation in 1919, Maulana Muhammad Ali, Maulana Shawkat Ali and Maulana Abul Kalam Azad came out of jail and took the leadership of this movement. Under their leadership, this movement took the form of a mass movement in the entire subcontinent. This movement started in 1920 to protect the status of the 'Khilafat' of the Muslim world, so it is known as the 'Khilafat Movement'.

Adoption of Non-Cooperation Movement: Caliphate movement vowed to protect the integrity of the Turkish Empire and religious sanctuaries. They also continued to work for the independence of the Indian subcontinent.

At this time, the Congress, under the leadership of Gandhiji, continued to agitate for autonomy in the Indian subcontinent. But as their demands were not met, the Congress became very dissatisfied with the British Government. At that time, the Indian discontent erupted into violent protests due to the passing of the Rowlatt Act and the Jallianwala Bagh massacre. Realizing the importance of the incident, the Indian National Congress adopted the plan of non-cooperation movement under the leadership of Gandhiji Then in March 1920, Gandhiji adopted a program of non-violent non-cooperation movement and observed mourning day on March 19. At that time, the Central Khilafat Committee reiterated the demands of the Muslims and announced the policy of non-cooperation with the British government. Abandonment of official titles and unpaid posts in declarations; Resignation from private posts in the government, resignation from the police and army and stoppage of taxes are called for.

In view of the declared principles of the Khilafat, Gandhiji attended the Khilafat Conference held in Sindh Province in July 1920 and urged the 23 crore Hindu people of India to come forward with the help of 7 crore Muslims. At the Sindh Conference, Gandhi announced that a non-violent non-cooperation movement against the British would be launched on August 1 through fasting and prayer.

In the same year, at the Congress session in Calcutta, Gandhi proposed a non-violent non-cooperation movement and promised the assembled members that if the people of India were guided according to his plan, it would be possible to achieve India's swaraj within a year. Despite the opposition of some leaders including Muhammad Ali Jinnah, Gandhiji's proposal was accepted with the support of the majority. As President of the Muslim League, Muhammad Ali Jinnah disagreed with Gandhiji but accepted his policy of non-violent non-cooperation against the British. In the Nagpur session of the Congress, Gandhiji's proposal of non-violent movement was unanimously accepted. The Congress and the Khilafat Committee agreed on three main goals of the Non-Cooperation Movement. Namely: satisfaction of Punjab's grievances, end of British government's wrongdoing to the Khilafat and Swaraj to the people of India.

At this time the Congress and Muslim League leaders felt the need for mutual help and cooperation in supporting their respective movements. Then the leaders of both the movements met in a conference in Amritsar and decided to conduct the movement jointly under the leadership of Gandhiji. Taking the joint leadership of both movements, Gandhi announced the principles of non-violent non-cooperation movement against the British government on 1 August 1920. Gandhiji led this anti-government movement with a focus on violent boycotts and satyagraha. Through this movement, Congress abandoned its policy of political begging forever. Dr. According to AR Desai, the Non-Cooperation Movement paved the way for the subsequent national movement in India.

Program of Movement: The program of non-cooperation movement led by Gandhiji was constructive and exclusionary. Among the constructive programs were the promotion of indigenous products such as the widespread use of desi charka and khaddar, avoidance of untouchability, promotion of Hindu-Muslim harmony.

Formation of people's arbitration board instead of courts, establishment of national schools and colleges, expansion of handloom industry and village development etc.

Boycott programs included boycott of foreign goods, boycott of drugs, boycott of government titles, boycott of government functions and schools-colleges, boycott of legislatures and courts etc.

Intensity of the movement: As the Khilafat and non-cooperation movement were combined under the leadership of Gandhiji, it soon took the form of a Durbar movement. Both Hindus and Muslims actively participated in this movement. Gandhiji's Prominent lawyers like Motilal Nehru, Chittaranjan Das, Rajendra Prasad, Raja Gopalachari etc. abandoned their legal profession. Students leave schools and colleges. Waste products were discarded and burned, and workers walked out of factories. As a result, the use of local products is everywhere. Dr. Under the leadership of Zakir Hussain, the students of Aligarh Muslim University founded a new educational institution called 'Jamia Millia Islamia'. Jawahar Lal Nehru and Subhash Chandra Bose actively joined this movement. The non-cooperation movement soon spread throughout the Indian subcontinent and an unprecedented enthusiasm arose among the people. When the Prince of Wales visited India in 1921, the people of India welcomed him with nationwide strikes and protests.

Repressive policy of the government: Noticing the prevalence of the non-cooperation movement, the government was determined to suppress it with a strong hand. As a result, unspeakable torture by the government on unarmed Indians and the imprisonment of all Congress and Khilafat leaders except Gandhiji. Against this suppression policy of the government, the Congress decided to disobey the law. Gandhiji told the Governor General that if the imprisoned satyagrahis were not released within seven days, the countrymen would be advised not to pay the revenue.

Chowrichaura Incident and Movement Withdrawal: An agitated crowd at Chowrichaura in Gorakhpur set fire to Chowrichaura police station, killing 23 policemen including a constable. Although Gandhiji ordered the struggle to be completely non-violent, he was shocked by the Chaurichaura incident and realizing the immediate importance of the incident, he announced the withdrawal of the movement. Following his declaration, Motilal Nehru and Lala Lajpat Roy commented that "Gandhiji punished the whole country for the sins of one people in one place." The British government and the agitators started brutal torture and oppression. As a result, the movement stagnated. In 1924, the Turkish leader Mustafa Kemal Atatürk declared Turkey a modern democratic state after breaking the caliphate. As a result, the Khilafat movement stopped completely in 1924

* Bengal Pact-1923

Deshbandhu Chittaranjan Das was one of the many thinkers who appeared in the Indian subcontinent. He was a secular and liberal minded politician. His political foresight and prudence have made him memorable in the history of India. He realized from a far-reaching political perspective that 60 percent of the people of Bengal were Muslims. But their number in government jobs and other fields is very insignificant. He believes that Hindu-Muslim unity and communal harmony is necessary to liberate the people of India from the British rule. For this reason, he concluded a historic agreement called 'Bengal Pact' in 1923 after discussions with Muslim leaders like Sir Abdul Rahim, Sir Abdul Karim, Maulana Akram

Khan, Moniruzzaman Islamabadi, Maulvi Mujibur Rahman etc. As a result, Hindu-Muslim harmony increased in India. Opportunities are created for the Muslim people to get jobs and other facilities. But due to the sudden death of Deshbandhu Chittaranjan Das on June 16, 1925, the possibility of creating Hindu-Muslim harmony ended in failure.

Simon Commission and Nehru Report

The Indian Subcontinent Act of 1919 failed to fulfill the political aspirations of Indians. Indians started strongly opposing this law. The British government sent an 8-member commission under the leadership of Sir John Simon in November 1927 to examine the claims of Indians. The committee was named the Simon Commission after the chairman of the commission, Sir John Simon. Since there was no Indian member in this commission, it was mocked as 'white commission'. The commission submitted its report in two volumes in May 1930. The report proposed a federal system of government and autonomy for India. As there was no Indian member on the Commission and its proposals did not satisfy the Indian people, the Congress started the civil disobedience movement against it.

Nehru Report

In 1927, the British government sent a commission to the subcontinent under the leadership of Sir John Simon to resolve the political problems of the Indian subcontinent. But as there was no Indian member in this commission, Congress and Muslim League dismissed it mockingly as 'White Commission'. Then a 9-member committee headed by Congress leader Motilal Nehru submitted a report in August 1928 to resolve the constitutional crisis in the Indian subcontinent. This is known as the 'Nehru

Report'. The report proposed dominion status for the subcontinent, representative responsible government, provincial autonomy, creation of Sindh and Karnataka provinces, abolition of reserved rule in Bengal and Punjab etc. But the Nehru Report failed to maintain communal cohesion and made separatism more pronounced and widespread.

Jinnah's Fourteen Points and Round Table Meeting

The acceptance of the Nehru Report by the Congress in August 1928 effectively abrogated the Lucknow Pact and abandoned the Bengal Pact and the 'Delhi Proposal'. Muslim leaders were outraged and dismayed when the Nehru Report recommended abolition of separate electoral system and establishment of central administration. So dismayed by the Nehru report, Muhammad Ali Jinnah presented the famous 14-point demand to protect the interests of Muslims. These demands are:

1. A federal system of governance should be introduced in the Indian subcontinent.
2. Provision of similar autonomy to provinces and devolution of powers to provincial governments in additional matters.
3. Muslim community should be given proper representation in all legislatures.
4. One-third of the total number of seats in the Central Legislature shall be reserved for Muslims.
5. Implementation of communal road policy. However, if a community wishes to adopt the combined electoral system can

6. Keeping Muslim majority intact in Punjab, Bangladesh, North West Frontier Province.

7. To keep the freedom of religion of all communities intact.

8. Repeal of a bill if one-fourth members of a community oppose it in a legislature.

9. Separate Sindh province from Bombay into a new province.

10. To carry out constitutional reforms in Balochistan and North-West Frontier Province.

11. To preserve and develop the culture, education and literature of Muslims.

12. Appointment of one-third Muslim members in Central and Provincial Cabinets.

13. Not to make constitutional changes without the permission of the Provincial Legislature.

14. Reservation of meritorious posts for Muslims in recruitment.

Round table meeting

The British government organized three consecutive round table meetings in London to resolve the subcontinent's governance crisis. The Congress did not attend the first round table meeting held from 12 November 1930 to 19 January 1931 as the Indian subcontinent was not granted Dominion status. Instead, the Congress started the 'Law Disobedience Movement'. Mr. in the first round table meeting. Jinnah, Tejbahadur Sapru, Shere Bangla A. K. Fazlul Haque, Dr. BR Ambedkar and other leaders participated.

Meanwhile, in March 1931, the Congress reached an agreement with the British government and signed an agreement. It is known as 'Gandhi Irwin Pact'. The second round table session was held from 7 September to 1 December 1931. Gandhiji attended the round table meeting on behalf of the Congress. But this meeting failed because there was no compromise between Gandhi and Jinnah on the question of representation of the minority communities of the subcontinent. The third round table meeting was held from 17 November to 24 December 1932. Congress boycotted the meeting.

Communal Roweddad, 1932

The interim decisions announced by the British government on August 17, 1932 regarding the formulation of a new constitution for the Indian subcontinent and the representation of the people of various communities in the provinces are known as 'Communal Roedada'. In this row, the distribution of seats in provincial legislatures was announced according to population for Muslims in some provinces, Europeans in Bengal, Hindus in Sindh and the North-West Frontier Province, and Sikhs in the North-West Frontier Province of Punjab. In this road, the right of separate elections was recognized for the people of the underdeveloped classes of the Indian subcontinent.

Rule of India Act of 1935.

Introduction: In order to solve the constitutional crisis in India, the Indian Rule Act of 1919 and the Simon Commission Report of 1927 did not satisfy both the Hindu and Muslim communities in India. As a result, the British government urged the Indian leaders to send a report to the British Parliament that was unanimously accepted. Following the call of the British government, the Nehru report of 1928 and Mr. When Jinnah's fourteen point demands were published, the crisis of governance in India intensified and creates a stalemate. In order to resolve this deadlock, the British government arranged three round table meetings in England to try to understand the attitude of the Indians. But the results of the round table meeting did not make any progress in solving the governance problems. As a result, civil disobedience movement took a prominent shape in India. The recommendations of the round table meetings are published in a white paper. This White Paper was examined and revised by a Joint Committee set up by the British Parliament and presented in the form of a report on 22 November 1934. In 1935, this report was passed as the Rule of India Act after due discussion in both houses of Parliament. The Act received Royal Assent on 2 August 1935. This is historically known as the Indian Rule Act. There were two main provisions of this law; Such as – (a) formation of an all-India union with British Indian provinces and native states and (b) provision of provincial autonomy.

(a) Managerial Assembly: In the Government of India Act, 1935, the lower house of the Central Legislature was called the Managerial Assembly. The Board of Directors consists of 375 members. Out of 375 seats, 125 members were nominated by native kings. Of the remaining 250, 4 members were elected by merchants, labor and industry. The other 246 members were elected indirectly through the Provincial Legislative Councils. Below is the table of province wise seat distribution:

1937 Provincial Legislature Elections

1937 Provincial Legislature Election is an important event in the history of India's governance The Indian people became politically conscious when the provision of provincial autonomy was introduced in the Indian provinces in the Indian Rule Act of 1935. As a result, in February 1937, the general election in 11 provinces in India received a huge response from the people. The total number of voters in this election was about thirty three crore fifty lakh. The election is held on communal basis.

Muhammad Ali Jinnah was engaged in legal profession at one time. But on the news of the 1937 provincial legislative elections, he left the legal profession in Bilat and moved to India. At that time the Muslim League was a moribund organization of Indian elite Muslim families. Muhammad Ali Jinnah took charge of the Muslim League and recruited ordinary Muslims from the Indian elite to the middle class and even the common Muslims to increase the membership of the Muslim League. That's why Muslim League decided membership fee of 50 paisa and monthly subscription of 25 paisa (Path way of Politics). However, with the concerted efforts of Muhammad Ali Jinnah and Hussain Shaheed Suhrawardy, the number of Muslim League members increased and the Muslim League stood tall. Jinnah formed the Muslim League Parliamentary Board of undivided Bengal with Shaheed Suhrawardy as its secretary. Achieving provincial autonomy for the provinces of India was included in the election program of the Muslim League and became a challenge.

In this election, out of the eleven provinces of India, the Congress won a large majority in seven provinces. Those provinces are Madras, United Pradesh, Madhya Pradesh, Bihar, Orissa, Bombay and Muslim North West Frontier Province. The Muslim League failed to win the reserved Muslim seats in those provinces. In undivided Bengal, the Muslim League and Sher Bangla AK Fazlul Haque's Peasant-Praja Party led a fierce contest and both parties won almost equal number of seats. Hossain Shaheed Suhrawardy's extraordinary organizational achievements were one of the major achievements of the Muslim League of undivided Bengal. Muslim League did not achieve any success in Muslim majority provinces like Punjab, Sindh and North Western Provinces. Muslim League won only 103 seats out of 491 Muslim seats in 11 states of India. On the other hand, out of 808 Hindu seats, Congress won 706 seats. The election results made Indian Muslim leaders very anxious about the future. The result of this election is given with the help of table below.

Although the Provincial Autonomy in the Government of India Act of 1935 was not completely successful, it cannot be called a failure. Because its importance is immense in the history of India's regime. Although the people of India had long hoped for the establishment of provincial autonomy. But it was not possible in practice due to the intervention of the Provincial Governors and the Governor General in the Rule of India Act, 1935. Actually both of them were just agents of British government. However, it can be safely said that the Government of India Act of 1935 was the foundation of the Constitution of India. Subsequently, the constitution of Pakistan-India was drafted following this law. The important contribution of this act was the provincial elections of 1937. All political parties of India participated in this election. Indian Congress won 7 out of 11 provinces. In the rest of the provinces, the Peasant Praja Party and the Muslim League won.

Importance of Provincial Elections of 1937

The provincial elections of 1937 were the country's first elections under the Rule of India Act of 1935. Through this election, representative governance was introduced in the Indian subcontinent.

The provincial elections of 1937 were held for the introduction of provincial autonomy in the Government of India Act of 1935. But due to various reasons, it was not possible to fully implement it.

This act called for the establishment of responsible government through elections in the Indian provinces. That is why responsible government system was introduced in the province in 1937 elections. Because in this system, the cabinet members are responsible to the representatives elected by the people through direct elections. As a result of this election, the establishment of responsible governance in the provinces of India in the future is a good start.

The provincial elections of 1937 marked the auspicious beginning and foundation of elections in India.

In the provincial elections of 1937, the Congress formed a single government in the provinces except Punjab and Bengal. In Congress-ruled states, hoisting of the Congress flag and the singing of the 'Vandemataram' song became mandatory, leading to the spread of communalism. Not only that, the Hindu-Muslim harmony is destroyed by treating the Muslims in a safe manner. As a result, the hostile treatment of Muslims in Congress-ruled provinces made them aware of the future. Then Muhammad Ali Jinnah raised his two nation theory.

The two main provisions of the Congress Act were – (a) the formation of an All-India Union with the British Indian provinces and native states and (b) the provision of provincial autonomy.

In the proposed federal system, the central government would be vested in the Governor General and his cabinet. The Ministers shall be appointed by the Governor General from among the members of the Central Legislature and shall be responsible to the Legislature for their activities. The administrative functions of the central government were divided into reserved and devolved. The Governor General and three advisers will be entrusted with the management of reserved matters such as national defence, maintenance of peace and order, religious matters etc. Devolved matters shall be managed by the Governor General in consultation with the Cabinet. In a word, dual governance was introduced at the centre.

The Government of India Act of 1935 introduced a system of autonomy in the provinces instead of dual rule. Each province shall have a Cabinet to assist the Governor in administrative functions. The Governor appoints the Minister from among the elected members of the Provincial Legislature. The provincial cabinet is collectively responsible to the legislature for their work and ministers resign if they lose the confidence of the legislature. The cabinet is given independent powers to run the government.

But actually the autonomy introduced in the Rule of India Act of 1935 was not proper. because-

(1) According to the Government of India Act, 1935, the provincial governors were not formal heads.

(2) The Governors were agents of the British Government and were answerable to the British Government - not to the Indians.

(3) The Provincial Governors could interfere in the activities of the Provincial Government through their personal judicial and discretionary powers called 'Special Powers'.

(4) Governor General could interfere in provincial affairs. He could also legislate on central and provincial matters if he declared a state of emergency.

(5) In addition, due to the exercise of powers by the Governor to veto bills passed by the Provincial Legislature, promulgate laws and ordinances of the Governor, provincial autonomy becomes meaningless and a farce.

(6) This Act established a Federal Court consisting of a Chief Justice and two other Judges. This court is empowered to interpret the Constitution and settle disputes between the Center and the Provinces.

(7) This Act provides for a bicameral Legislative Assembly at the Centre. The upper house is called 'Rashtriya Sabha' and the lower house is called 'Executive Assembly'.

Lahore Resolution, 1940

Congress claims itself as a national institution for all Indian communities but fails to protect the interests of Muslims. As a result, in 1906, the Muslim League emerged as a separate political party to protect the interests of Muslims. Jawaharlal Nehru did not want to give the Muslim League equal status with the Congress, and soon the anti-mass activities of the Indian Congress made Indian Muslims skeptical about the future.

According to the Indian Rule of 1935, the National Congress won an absolute majority in 7 provinces in the 1937 Provincial Legislature elections. In 7 provinces the Congress formed the cabinet on its own without any consultation with the Muslim League. On the other hand, the Muslim League formed a coalition cabinet with other parties in Bengal and Punjab. The obstinacy of the Congress led to bitterness between the Muslim League and the Congress over the formation of some provincial cabinets and the question of Muslim representation. At that time, the Congress-ruled provincial governments began to govern with a communal spirit. In Congress-ruled India, law courts in seven provinces sought to promote Hinduism, including hoisting the Congress flag in educational institutions and introducing Vande Mataram as the national anthem. As a result, the communal riots caused by Hindu-Muslim people in the subcontinent upset the life of both.

The two-nation theory

A session of the Muslim League was held in 1940 in Lahore, the capital of Punjab, in the context of communal riots between Hindu-Muslim people. In this session, Muhammad Ali Jinnah raised the two-nation theory. According to him, Hindu-Muslims are two separate castes in India. According to any definition of nation, Muslims are a nation. So Muslims need to have a separate state for language, literature and culture and good life. The then Chief Minister of Bengal. K. The proposal that Fazlul Haque put forward on the basis of the two-nation theory in this session of the Muslim League is known as the famous historical 'Lahore Proposal'.

The Muslim League expressed its well-considered opinion that any constitutional scheme to be effective in future India should be based on the following principles. To form multiple regions by demarcating geographically contiguous or contiguous units or provinces; That the North-West Region and the Eastern Region of India may be grouped together to form 'Independent States', wherein the annexed units or provinces shall be autonomous and sovereign."

Characteristics of the Lahore proposal

1. Apart from the geographical location, the areas were to be identified as separate 'territories', avoiding the federal system proposed in the Government of India Act, 1935.
2. Multiple independent states should be formed with the Muslim majority regions of India's north-west and east.
3. The states or provinces of this independent and sovereign state shall be fully autonomous and sovereign.
4. The constitution should have effective and binding provisions to protect the rights and interests of minorities.

The historic Lahore Resolution played an important role in solving the political problems of the subcontinent. The proposal to form two independent and sovereign states was accepted due to the geographical distance of the north-western and eastern regions of the Indian subcontinent, linguistic differences and differences in culture. But in the correspondence between Jinnah and Gandhi in September 1944, Jinnah mentioned the formation of an independent Muslim state with only Muslim-majority areas, excluding multiple states. Despite many debates about the formation of multiple states, Muhammad Ali Jinnah, in a special meeting of the Muslim League members of the Legislature in Delhi on April 9, 1946, accepted the proposal for the formation of one state instead of multiple states. As a result, an independent sovereign state called Pakistan was born on August 14, 1947, although it was not mentioned in the original proposal. In history, this proposal is known as the historic 'Lahore Proposal'.

Cripps proposal, 1942

The British government sent Sir Stafford Cripps, an influential minister in the British cabinet, to India in March 1942 with a number of specific proposals to satisfy the Indian people and resolve the bureaucratic deadlock in India. Sir Stafford Cripps held discussions with Congress and Muslim League leaders on the proposals he drafted. But neither side accepted Cripps' offer. His proposals called for Dominion status for India, introduction of a federal government and any provinces joining or remaining separate from the United States. However, as an interim measure, it is proposed to entrust the responsibility of India's defense to the British government until a new constitution is drafted.

The Muslim League initially showed a lenient attitude towards the proposal, but later refused to accept it as it offered the possibility of forming 'Pakistan'. But the Congress could not be happy with the proposal to keep the provinces independent. Congress therefore rejected this proposal and demanded full independence for India. Gandhi ridiculed the Cripps proposal saying, "It is a post dated check on a crushing Bank."

Quit India Movement, 1942

When the Cripps Mission failed to resolve India's political crisis, it was rejected by all political parties. After the fall of Rangoon in 1942, the threat of a Japanese invasion of India increased. In the meantime, Gandhiji propagated the 'Bharat Quit' plan against the British government in the Harijan newspaper. He requested the British government that if they hand over power to Indians and go to Britain, there will be no possibility of India being invaded by Japan. Noting Gandhiji's attitude, the Congress Working Committee approved Gandhiji's 'Quit India' policy on 14 July 1942. The Congress Working Committee decided that the British Government should leave India immediately or they would start a nationwide civil disobedience movement. Then on August 8, 1942, the 'Quit India' movement was called at the Congress session in Bombay. The British government consequently arrested top local Congress leaders and declared the Congress an illegal institution, closing the Congress building in Allahabad and confiscating all funds. India suffered huge losses in the 'Quit India' movement. According to Nehru alone, 4,000 to 10,000 people were killed in this movement. Then on August 8, 1944, when Gandhiji was released from jail, the movement gradually weakened. All classes of people in India participated in this movement, but Muhammad Ali Jinnah this movement for Muslims Ordered to stay away from. Because Jinnah's demand was first to partition India and then to leave India. A political vacuum was created in India when top Congress leaders were arrested. The Indian Muslim League under the leadership of Jinnah tried to fill that void and within a short time the Muslim League was organized and became an all-India political organization.

Cabinet Plan, 1946

After the Second World War, labor unrest in the Indian subcontinent took on a serious form. At that time, industrial establishments, factories, postal and its department employees of the subcontinent and even railway employees observed an all-India strike. Students of schools and colleges also play a leading role in strikes, hartals and mass protests. Realizing the importance of mass protests in the Indian subcontinent, the then Labor Party Prime Minister Attlee decided to send three members of the cabinet to the subcontinent to solve the political problems of the subcontinent. Then on February 19, 1946, he appointed three members of the cabinet-1. Sir Stafford Cripps, 2. Lord Pathetic Lawrence, 3. AV Alexander formed a commission to solve the political and administrative problems of the subcontinent. This commission is known as 'Ministerial Mission'. The 'Mission' headed by Sir Stafford Cripps arrived in India on 24th March 1946 and started talks with the Indian leaders. The Cabinet held discussions with the Congress and Muslim League leaders on the modalities of granting independence to the subcontinent and the drafting of a future constitution. But due to differences between the two parties, the cabinet members finally announced their own plans. This is known as 'Ministerial Plan' in history.

Cabinet proposals: The plans or proposals of the Cabinet were as follows-

1. The plan was to form a union with the Indian provinces and native states and to give autonomy to the provinces

2. The provinces are divided into three groups A, B and C on the basis of religion. Group 'A' will include Hindu major Madras, Bombay, United Pradesh, Uttar Pradesh, Bihar and Orissa. Group 'B' will have Muslim majority Punjab, Sindh and North-West Frontier Province. Group C will consist of relatively small Muslim majority Bengal and Assam.

3. The above provinces shall enjoy full autonomy and the provinces shall administer their own local governments and

Will compose the regime.

4. The representatives of each of the provinces or native states will draft the constitution or constitution of the United States of India.

5. According to the new constitution, the provinces can secede from any group if necessary subject to the decision of their respective legislatures.

6. Until a new constitution is drafted, an interim government will be formed with representatives of India's major political parties.

Although the Cabinet did not directly accept the demand for a separate Muslim state, it actually accepted the two-nation theory of the Muslim League by planning to divide the provinces. The Muslim League agreed to the proposal of the Cabinet, considering it helpful for the formation of Pakistan. But the Congress refused to join the interim government as the provinces were divided on communal lines.

When there was a mutual disagreement between the Congress and the Muslim League on the formation of the interim government, the Muslim League demanded the formation of the interim government alone. In this situation, the Viceroy announced the temporary suspension of the formation of the interim government. On 29 July 1946, the Muslim League was enraged by the Viceroy's announcement and rejected the Cabinet's plan and declared a direct struggle for the acquisition of Pakistan.

The Congress decided to join the interim government when the Muslim League withdrew from the cabinet plan. On August 16, 1946, the Muslim League called for the observance of Direct Struggle Day due to the arbitrary decision of the Viceroy and the Congress. As a result Hindu-Muslim riots started in different parts of India including Calcutta.

In view of this situation, on 2 September 1946, the Congress formed a 12-member interim government under the leadership of Jawaharlal Nehru. The Muslim League observed the day as 'Black Day' and criticized the Congress and the Viceroy. Gradually, the fumes of communal riots spread throughout the subcontinent. As a result, the British government requested the Muslim League to join the interim government. In view of such incidents, on 12 October 1946, five members of the Muslim League under the leadership of Liaquat Ali Khan joined the interim government.

But when the Congress and the Muslim League showed failure to fulfill their responsibilities unitedly in the interim government system, it created frustration among the people. As a result, the cabinet plan ended in failure.

Abhyudaya or Mountbatten plan of states of Pakistan and India

The cabinet plan failed due to the intolerant attitude and infighting of the Congress and the Muslim League. As a result, when the Muslim League announced the observance of 'Direct Struggle Day' on August 16, 1946 and 'Black Day' on September 2, communal riots spread throughout India, including Calcutta. The British government was alarmed by the severity of the incident. Realizing the horrors of communal riots, British Prime Minister Clement-Attlee announced on 20 February 1947 that power would be handed over to the Indian people by June 1948. This declaration of Prime Minister Attlee is known as 'February Declaration'. After Attlee's declaration in February, all conflicts and disputes between the Congress and the Muslim League came to an end. They both prepare for freedom. The British government appointed Lord Mountbatten as the new Viceroy of India in place of Lord Wavell for the transfer of power to India.

Mountbatten arrived in Delhi on 22 March 1947 and tried to restore communal harmony between the Muslim League and the Congress regarding the transfer of power in India. But he presented a plan to the people of India on June 3, 1947 after long discussions with the Indian leaders. This is known as June 3 Plan or Mountbatten Plan. In this declaration, he stated that "there is no alternative way to establish peace in India except the partition of India." The Mountbatten Plan proposed the creation of two separate states, India and Pakistan. Native states were given the freedom to join either 'Pakistan' or the Dominion of India. It was decided to divide Bengal and Punjab. Referendums decide whether the * Frontier Province of North-West Radcliffe, Baluchistan, and Sylhet, Assam, will join Pakistan. A commission headed by the legislature of his dominions was also appointed. Will write the constitution. Both Muslim League and Congress supported this proposal. Sir for marking the border of the two countries.

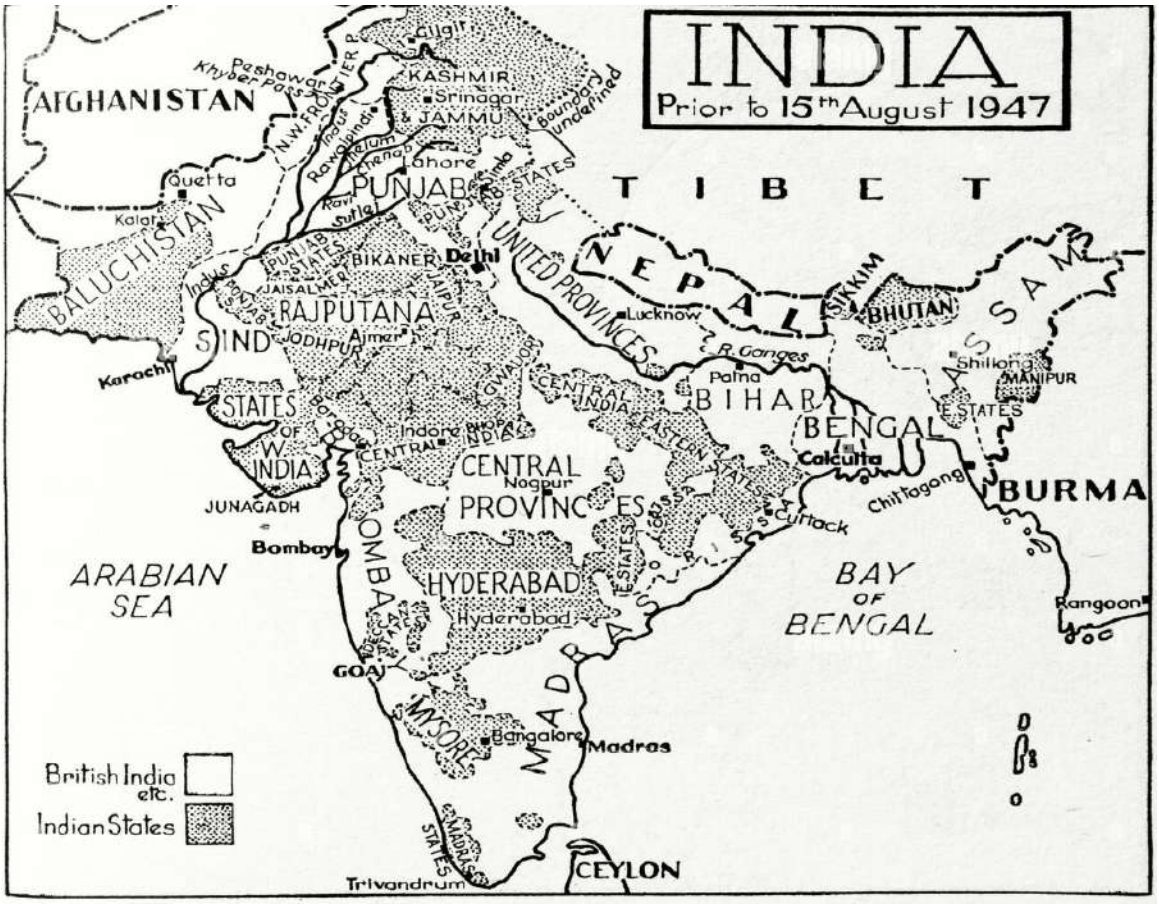

Government of India Act, 1947

The British Parliament enacted Act 18 of 1947 to give effect to the Mountbatten Plan of 3 June 1947. The provisions of this Act are given below: The Act passed in July is known as the 'Indian Independence Act'. This is the last thing about British rule in India

1. Dominion: In this act, India was divided into two dominions named Union of India and Pakistan. Dominions are de facto independent and sovereign states. No Act of the British Parliament shall have effect over the Dominions of India and Pakistan.

(2)Dominion Constituent Assembly: This Act provides for the formation of two Constituent Assemblies for two Dominions. The responsibility of framing the constitution of the respective countries is left to the respective Constituents. This Constituent Assembly will also act as the Legislative Assembly of the respective country until the drafting of the Constitution is completed.

3. Rule of British Responsibilities and Independence of Home States: As a result of this Act, Home States will no longer be under the responsibility of the British Empire and the sovereignty of the British Empire will also disappear. From August 14 they can join any state of India and Pakistan or remain independent.

4. Creation of India and Pakistan: As a result of this act, Pakistan was established with the Sylhet district of Assam and East Bengal, West Punjab, Sindh, North-West Frontier Province and Balochistan and the Dominion of India was formed with the rest of India.

5. Amendments to the Government of India Act, 1935: Until a constitution is framed by the Dominion Constituent Assembly, the governance of the two countries shall be governed by the following amendments to the Government of India Act, 1935:

(b) Appointment of Governor General: The British Raj will appoint the Governor General on the advice of the Cabinet. (c) Diminution of powers of the British Parliament: The British Parliament shall have no supremacy in Dominion legislative matters and no Act of the British Parliament shall apply to the Dominions.

(d) Freedom to remain or not to remain in the Commonwealth: A Dominion can withdraw from the Commonwealth at any time and sever the nominal connection it has established with the British Crown.

Rise of Pakistan and India

The 'Indian Independence Act' of 1947 is an important document in the colonial history of the Indian subcontinent. In July 1947, the Indian Independence Act was first passed by the House of Commons and later by the House of Lords. Later, the Indian Independence Bill became law on 18 July with royal assent. According to the Indian Independence Act, two independent sovereign states namely Pakistan and India were born on August 14 and 15, 1947 respectively. Muhammad Ali Jinnah became the first Governor General of Pakistan and Nawabzada Liaquat Ali Khan, the last Governor of British India, became the Governor General of India. General Lord Mountbatten. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru became the Prime Minister of India and Prime Minister of Pakistan.

Explanation of key terms

Viceroy: On August 2, 1858, after the Sepoy Mutiny, the British Parliament passed an Act handing over the governance of India to Queen Victoria of England. It is not possible for the Queen to rule India from far away England. Therefore, one of the British Cabinet Ministers was appointed as India Secretary and it was decided that he would administer the affairs of India with the help of a Council of 15 members. As the representative of the British throne, the Governor General is appointed as the Viceroy or the Viceroy.

Royal Title Act: When the Royal Title Act was passed by the Parliament of England in 1876, Lord Lytton declared Queen Victoria as the Emperor of India in a grand ceremony in Delhi.

Liberal: Lord Ripon is remembered in Indian history as a peaceful, benevolent and liberal ruler. He was strongly opposed to imperialism. He adopted a liberal policy in politics and greatly encouraged the local autonomy of the Indian people.

Bengal Tenancy Act: The notable achievement of Lord Ripon's rule was the laying of the foundation of the Revenue and Tenancy Act. He formulated plans for the Tenancy Act to improve the condition of the ryots of Bangladesh and Ayodhya. Which later came to be known as the Bangal Tenancy Act.

Partition of Bengal : Lord Curzon divided the whole of Bangladesh i.e. Bengal Presidency into two provinces due to administrative difficulties. On 5 July 1905, he officially announced the decision of partition of Bengal, known as Partition of Bengal.

Swadeshi Movement: When the partition of Bengal was announced, the leaders of a section of the Congress opposed it and adopted this 'boycott' or boycott policy' in a large protest meeting at the Town Hall of Calcutta on August 7, 1905. The main objective of this policy was to destroy the textile industry by boycotting England's textiles and to revive the Indian industries quickly. As a result, the boycott movement soon turned into a mass movement. In history, this movement is known as Swadeshi movement.

Abolition of Partition of Bengal: The British government became alarmed when the Swadeshi movement gradually took the form of an armed movement. The agitators continued terrorist activities throughout the country to overthrow the British government. The revolutionaries started arson, looting and political assassinations in various places. Khudiram was hanged and Prafulla Chaki committed suicide in the failed attempt to kill Baralat of Bengal in this terrorist activity. Despite the sabotaging activities of compatriots and terrorists at various places, the British government remained steadfast in its policy. Lord Curzon resigned due to differences with General Kitchener over the partition of Bengal. Then the new Viceroy Lord Hardinge came to India and canceled the 'Partition of Bengal' through a declaration in 1911 at the inauguration ceremony of the fifth judge convened at the Delhi Durbar.

Aligarh Movement: Sir Syed Ahmad Khan was very distressed to see the wall of separation between the Muslims and the government during the British rule. He played a very important role in bridging the gap between the Muslims and the British government. The movement he initiated to bring the backward Muslims into a progressive mindset with the government in all spheres socially, culturally and politically is known as the Aligarh movement.

Lucknow Pact: Lucknow Pact is an important document of Hindu-Muslim compromise against the British government. The ninth annual conference of the Congress-Muslim League was held in Lucknow in December 1916. In this conference, Barrister Abdur Rasool presented a joint governance plan proposal and it was unanimously accepted. Thus the Lucknow Agreement is a wonderful document of Hindu-Muslim harmony and understanding.

Rowlatt Act: The infamous and reactionary Rowlatt Act was introduced in 1918. This Act provided for the suppression of the press and the imprisonment and deportation of any person without trial. No person convicted by this Act had any right of appeal to a higher court. In protest of this law, during the protest day of Amritsar from 6th April to 13th April, under the orders of General Dyer, the brutal massacre of the army took place. Which is known as Jallianwala Bagh massacre.

Montagu-Chelmsford Reform Act: The socialist revolution in Russia in 1917 gave more encouragement to the Indian people. In view of the above incident, Indian Secretary Edwin Montagu assured the Indian people that "the Indian people will be gradually involved in governance so that responsible governance can be established." The then Secretary of India Barlat Chelmsford recommended to the British Parliament the issue of India's autonomy. Based on their recommendations, the British Parliament passed an Act in 1919 known historically as the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms Act.

Great Mughal of the White Hall. The powers of the Indian Secretary were further enhanced by the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms Act. He controlled and managed the Governor General of India and the members of the Executive Council. His office was established at White Hall in England. He was called the Great Mughal of the White Hall for his dominance and unlimited power in governing India.

Simon Commission: The Montague Chelmsford Reforms Act of 1919 failed to satisfy the political aspirations and demands of Indians for autonomy. Indians started strongly opposing this act. As a result, the British government sent an 8-member commission to India under the leadership of Sir John Simon in November 1927 to examine the claims of the people of India. The committee was named Simon Commission after the chairman of the commission, Sir John Simon. Because there was no Indian member in this commission, it was mocked as white commission. The commission submitted its report in Dukhand in May 1930. The report proposed a federal system of government and autonomy for India. As there was no Indian member on the Commission and its proposals did not satisfy the Indian people, the Congress started the civil disobedience movement against it.

Nehru Report: When the Montagu-Chelmsford Act of 1919 and the Simon Commission Report of 1930 failed to resolve the constitutional crisis of the Indian people, the British government urged the Indian leaders to send a unanimous report to the British Parliament. After that, the 9-member committee led by Congress leader Motilal Nehru submitted a report to the British Parliament in August 1928 to resolve the constitutional crisis in the Indian subcontinent. This is known as the Nehru Report. This report is representative responsible government of Dominion status for the subcontinent. Provincial autonomy, creation of Sindh and Karnataka provinces, abolition of reserved rule in Bengal and Punjab etc. were proposed. But the Nehru Report failed to maintain communal cohesion and made separatism more pronounced and widespread.

Rule of India Act of 1935: The Rule of India Act of 1919 and the Simon Commission Report of 1927 to resolve India's constitutional crisis did not satisfy both the Hindu and Muslim communities in India. As a result, the British government urged the Indian leaders to send a unanimous report to the British Parliament. Following the call of the British Government, the Nehru Report and Mr. When Jinnah's 'Fourteen Points' demand was published, there was a constitutional crisis in India and one A stalemate is created. To solve this deadlock, the British government arranged three round table meetings in a row. Tried to know the attitude of Indians. The result of the round table meeting did not make any progress in solving the governance problem. As a result, the civil disobedience movement in India took a prominent form. The recommendations of the round table meetings are published in a 'White Paper'. This 'White Paper' was examined and revised by a Joint Committee set up by the British Parliament and presented in the form of a report on 22 November 1934. In 1935, this report was passed as the Rule of India Act after proper discussion in both houses of Parliament. On August 2, 1935, the Act received royal assent. This is known as Rule of India Act.

Cripps Mission, 1942

After the bitter experience of Congress rule after the 1937 elections, the Muslim League accepted the Lahore Resolution in 1940. The spread of communalism during the Congress rule created a political crisis between Hindus and Muslims. Moreover, during the Second World War in 1939, the British government became very worried when Japan, Singapore and Burma were occupied and they advanced to the eastern border of India. Therefore, the government sent Sir Stafford Cripps, an influential minister of the British Cabinet, to negotiate with the Indian leaders on March 22, 1942, with a number of specific proposals to satisfy the Indian people and resolve the bureaucratic deadlock in India. The arrival of Sir Stafford Cripps to discuss governance issues with Indian leaders is known as the Cripps Mission.

Cabinet Plan, 1946 : In order to solve the political and administrative problems of India, the then British Prime Minister Attlee on February 19, 1946, three members of the Cabinet Sir Stafford Cripps, Lord Pathycolors and A. V. Alexander formed a cabinet. The mission headed by Sir Stafford Cripps arrived in India on March 24, 1946 and started talks with Indian leaders. The Cabinet discussed with the Congress and the Muslim League the procedure for granting independence to the subcontinent and the drafting of a future constitution. But the differences between the two parties eventually led to the cabinet members announcing their own plans. That's it in history Known as Ministerial Plan.

Indian Independence Act, 1947

The Act passed by the British Parliament on 18 July 1947 to give legal effect to the Mountbatten Plan of 3 June 1947 is known as the 'Indian Independence Act'. It is about British rule in India Latest legislation.

The 'Indian Independence Act' of 1947 is an important document in the colonial history of the Indian subcontinent. In July 1947, the 'Indian Independence Act' was first passed by the House of Commons and later by the House of Lords. Later, the Indian Independence Bill became law on 18 July with royal assent.

The Indian Independence Bill became law on 18 July with assent. By this law, two independent and sovereign states named East Pakistan and India on August 15, 1947 were born in this subcontinent.

Chapter Four

Bengali language movement during the Pakistani era Its motion-nature

Introduction:

In 1947, an independent state was formed with the so-called East and West Pakistan based on Jinnah's two-nation theory. But apart from religion, it was two separate countries inhabited by different peoples with vast differences in geography, language, literature and cultural practices. As per the Lahore proposal, the federal system of government was introduced in the newly formed Pakistan, but the principle of separation of powers between the center and the provinces was not followed. As a result, the reluctance to devolve power to both the Center and the provinces and the absence of democratic governance. The impact of military rule, the discriminatory behavior of the Western ruling group towards East Bengal and Pakistan, angered the people of East Bengal. The formation of a strong Pakistani state required the introduction of a federal system of government in the public interest of both regions. But it was not possible because of the colonial attitude of the ruling group. As a result, the seeds of Bengali self-determination rights and independence movement began to germinate from the beginning. The Pakistanis adopted the policy of economic exploitation and political domination along with the language as a tool to exterminate the Bengalis. As a result, the Masonic foundation of the newly formed state of Pakistan was weakened from the start.

From 1947 to 1971, the Pakistani ruling class exploited and ruled Bangladesh for 24 long years. The history of these 24 years is the history of subjugation of Bengalis. A history of tyranny, torture and deprivation. However, the Bengalis did not tolerate this oppression and torture with their faces closed. At that time, the soldier Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman, the fearless hero of Bengal, appeared in the fortunes of the Bengali nation. Under his leadership the sleeping Bengalis woke up. Bengalis started protesting against the jail-tyranny and torture of the Pakistani regime. Finally, Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman declared the independence of Bengal on March 26, 1971. The armed struggle of Bengal began. Finally, in exchange of a sea of blood, on December 16, 1971, the Bengali nation achieved a complete victory and took away the red flag of Bangladesh's independence.

Political situation of East Bengal

Hussain Shaheed Suhrawardy had the greatest contribution to the victory of the Muslim League in the general elections of 1945-46, especially in undivided Bengal. In 1946, he was elected Chief Minister as the parliamentary leader of undivided Bengal. At this time he campaigned for undivided Bengal. Jinnah was displeased. He was a true compassionate friend of the Muslim people of Bengal. So he was not willing to divide Bengal. He was not at all willing to miss Calcutta. But Khwaja Nazimuddin, Nurul Amin, Maulana Akram Khan and other Bengali leaders abandoned the interests of Bengal at this time. Supported Jinnah's Bengal partition policy. In the greed of power and leadership, they at that time against Hossain Shahid Suhrawardy and against the interests of Bengalis. He supported Jinnah. East Bengal was an agricultural country. Although the middle class predominated here, they were helpless against the dominant feudal classes of Punjab and Sindh in West Pakistan. As a result, the political leadership began to be in the hands of the ruling class of Pakistan. Neither the post of Governor General nor Prime Minister of Pakistan has reached the fate of Bengalis. Jinnah along with Liaquat Ali started interfering in the politics of East Bengal. After August 14, 1947, Khwaja Nazimuddin was appointed as the Chief Minister of East Pakistan instead of Hussain Shaheed Suhrawardy through a despicable palace conspiracy. Although Punjab was divided, no new Chief Minister was appointed there. That is, the palace conspiracy started in the state of Pakistan at birth. No member of Suhrawardy's cabinet found a place in Nazimuddin's cabinet. Muhammad Ali Jinnah died on September 11, 1948. As a result, Khwaja Nazimuddin, an opponent of Bengali interests, became the Governor General and Nurul Amin became the Chief Minister. As a result of their undemocratic activities, Muslim League of Bengal became a separatist organization. The progressive section of the Muslim League became vocal against the anti-provincial autonomy activities of the ruling elite. And in January 1948, Shamchul Haque, Fakhruddin Ahmad, Sheikh Mujibur Rahman called a workers conference in protest. The young Bengali workers of the Muslim League of the Workers' Conference felt the need for democratic struggle. Democratic Jubo League and later Muslim League on January 4, 1948 and Awami Muslim League on June 23, 1949 were born. It was the first opposition party in Pakistani politics.

After independence, Lord Mountbatten was appointed as the head of state of India. But the ruling Muslim League and Mr. Jinnah did not. Mr. Jinnah himself became the Governor General of Pakistan. As a result, the British government deprived the newly formed state of Pakistan of its rightful assets and liabilities.

On April 27, 1947, Hossain Shahid Suhrawardy proposed a sovereign independent Bengal state. Bengal Muslim League Secretary Abul Hashim and Congress chiefs Sarat Bose and Kiran Shankar Roy fully supported the proposal. This proposal of Greater Bengal State is known as 'Basu-Sohrawardy' proposal.

At the time of the partition of India, Hossain Shahid Suhrawardy and Shere Bangla A. K. Fazlul Haque became vocal against the partition of Bengal. But then the religious fervor was so strong that Bengali Muslim League leaders did not listen to the words of Suhrawardy and Sher Bangla that day. When the matter of dividing Bengal was almost final, these two sympathetic leaders of Bengal demanded that if Bengal was divided, the capital would be like Berlin in Germany. Calcutta also has to be divided into two parts. Because the capital Calcutta was built on the wealth of East Bengal. The British rulers and Hindu leaders did not give importance to this demand. Likewise, Jinnah Liaquat Ali also did not show interest in this demand due to purely political reasons. Jinnah and Liaquat Ali clearly felt that Calcutta, if annexed to Pakistan, would be the capital of Pakistan. Because more than 56 percent of the total population of Pakistan are Bengalis. Kolkata is the largest international city. It was the capital of undivided India for a long time. Moreover, in Kolkata Capital Hall, Hossain Shahid Suhrawardy and Sher Bangla A.K. Fazlul Haque's influence and prestige will remain intact. Due to this fear, the Muslim League leaders like Jinnah-Liaquat did not suffer so much to divide Bengal and give up their claim on Calcutta. Instead, they were happy. In return they were negotiating with British rulers and Congress leaders to get Lahore within Pakistan instead of Calcutta. Bengal was finally partitioned, Kolkata was left out of East Bengal but Lahore was included in West Pakistan.

Economic condition

Jinnah's birthplace was Karachi instead of the country's capital, Dhaka, despite the majority of the population of newly formed Pakistan being Bengalis and the majority of the country's wealth coming from East Bengal. The majority of the cost of making Karachi the capital was provided by East Bengal at that time. But the ungrateful Pakistani rulers did not hesitate to exploit Bengalis in return. From the beginning of the development of Pakistan, the central leadership started to exploit the resources of East Bengal. Therefore, their economic exploitation and torture started on the people of East Bengal from the beginning. All kinds of factories and industries were established in West Pakistan instead of East Bengal. Although jute, leather, tea etc. were cash crops of East Bengal, marketing factories were established in West Pakistan. Dawood, Dada, Ispahani etc. companies are prime examples of this. Although Dhaka and Chittagong are two big cities of East Bengal, banks, insurance and big industrial companies are established in Karachi of West Pakistan. As a result, West Pakistan's business groups easily expanded their influence over East Bengal and improved their fortunes. From the beginning of the creation of Pakistan, they turned East Bengal into a colony or colony and continued all kinds of economic exploitation. Political leaders, students, businessmen and general public of East Bengal became vocal in protesting against the economic exploitation of West Pakistan.

Regime status

Parliamentary democracy was theoretically established in Pakistan after independence, but it was not implemented in practice. Because instead of Prime Minister Liaquat Ali Khan, all power was concentrated in the hands of Governor General Jinnah. He was not a systematic head. After independence, the power of bureaucrats in Pakistan grew overnight. Governor General Muhammad Ali Jinnah became more dependent on bureaucrats than political leaders. It did not take long to produce its toxic effects. When Liaquat Ali Khan was assassinated, former bureaucrat Ghulam Mohammad was appointed Governor General of Pakistan in October 1951. He declared a state of emergency in Pakistan, abolished the Constituent Assembly and axed all power in his hands. Then, under him and his successor Iskandar Mirza, the bureaucracy and army became extremely powerful. As a result, the democratic norms in the politics of Pakistan are gradually disappearing. The political leaders became helpless victims of the palace intrigues of the bureaucrats and the army. The first Secretary General of Pakistan, Chaudhry Muhammad Ali and the first Chief Secretary of East Pakistan, Aziz Ahmad, did not respect the political leaders and ministers but always behaved rudely towards the democratic institutions.

Awami League was born

Introduction: After independence Pakistan had no strong political party and basically one-party rule was established there. The ruling Muslim League leaders were not ready to tolerate dissenting views. Even people from their own party could not give any constructive criticism. Hussain Shaheed Suhrawardy, the son of democracy, migrated to Pakistan from India in 1949 to settle permanently. The fearless, free-spirited and democratic leader was shocked to see the indifference towards democracy in independent Pakistan. He first tried to build the Muslim League as an organization that respects democratic governance. But the power-hungry leaders of Pakistan did not listen to his words that day. That is why he formed a political party called 'Awami Muslim League' along with Maulana Bhasani on 23 June 1949. This party was later able to play an important role in the authoritarian movement of Pakistan as well as the movement for autonomy.

In 1947, Hossain Shahid Suhrawardy, President of the Provincial Muslim League of Undivided Bengal, and General Secretary Abul Hashim accepted the plan to form the state of 'Undivided Bengal'. But as their efforts failed, Bengal was divided and joined with Pakistan. Which is called East Pakistan. As a result, the pro-Suhrawardy Muslim League party leaders and activists in independent Pakistan were especially cornered in youth and student politics. The conspiracy of ruling Khwaja Nazimuddin, Akram Khan-Nurul Amin group started against them. They left Hussain Shaheed Suhrawardy and appointed Khwaja Nazimuddin as the parliamentary leader and appointed as the Chief Minister of East Bengal. Then they engaged in a conspiracy to expel Shaheed Suhrawardy from East Bengal by canceling his membership in the Constituent Assembly. Similarly, Maulana Bhasani was also tortured and oppressed. Not only this, the reactionary section of the Muslim League became very active in the destruction of Bengali language and culture from 1947 onwards. At that time, youth leader Shamchul Haque of Tangail, Sheikh Mujibur Rahman of Faridpur, Tajuddin Ahmed of Dhaka, Kamruddin Ahmed, Mrs. Anwara Khatun etc.

were sitting in 150, Mughaltuli (Provincial Muslim League office) all the time. These youth leaders formed a separate group called 'Workers Camp'. Then they started criticizing the undemocratic activities of the ruling Muslim League government. Then the ruling Muslim League leaders became more angry when Bengali was supported as the state language. Thus the 'Workers' Camp Group' lost faith in the politics of the Muslim League and adopted a plan to form a new political party. For this purpose, on June 23, 1949, they convened a conference at Rose Garden. 300 delegates participated in the conference. The meeting unanimously decided to form an opposition political party called East Pakistan Awami Muslim League. Maulana Abdul Hamid Khan Bhasani was elected the president of the newly formed 40-member committee and Shamsul Haque of Tangail became the general secretary. Since Sheikh Mujibur Rahman was in jail at that time, he was elected joint secretary in the newly formed party in his absence.

On June 24, 1949, the first event of Awami Muslim League was held at Dhaka's Armanitola Maidan. At that time, during the rule of the Muslim League government, there was severe famine in the country. Maulana Abdul Hamid Khan Bhasani strongly criticized the government's 22-month rule. Apart from Maulana Bhasani, Yar Mohammad Khan, Abdul Jabbar Khaddar, Khairat Hossain and Shamsul Haque spoke in this public meeting. Sheikh Mujibur Rahman was in jail at that time.

In September 1949, Maulana Bhasani toured Panchgarh, Dinajpur, Rangpur, Bogra (Panchbibi) and held public meetings. At that time, when Sheikh Mujib was released from jail, he held organizational meetings and public meetings in Greater Faridpur. At this time, both leaders exposed the mismanagement and corruption of the Muslim League government. Then on October 23, Maulana Bhasani highlighted the nationwide food crisis and the plight of North Bengal in a public meeting held at the Armanitola Maidan. When the thugs raised by the ruling Muslim League leader Hamidul Haque Chowdhury created a disturbance in the public meeting, the boys of the Muslim Students League resisted them. After the public meeting, three people including Maulana Bhasani and Shamsul Haque were arrested by the police as they continued to march towards the Governor's House. On January 1, 1950, Sheikh Mujib again was arrested. Then the inhuman torture and suppression of the leaders and workers of the newly formed party began. Awami Muslim League vice-president Sakhawat Hossain, co-editor AKM Rafiqul Islam resigned from the party fearing government torture. Maulana Abdul Hamid Khan Bhasani and Shamsul Haque are still in jail

Awami Muslim League played a very important role in the language movement of 1952. Maulana Abdul Hamid Khan Bhasani was its president when the All-Party National Language Struggle Council was formed on January 30. Moreover, Awami Muslim League General Secretary Shamsul Haque, Vice President Ataur Rahman Khan, Khairat Hossain, Anwara Khatun, Almas Ali, Abdul Awal and other leaders played an important role in the all-party national language movement. At that time the boys of Awami Muslim Chhatra League also played an active role in the national language movement.

In 1953, Sheikh Mujibur Rahman toured the whole of Bangladesh to organize the Awami Muslim League better. At that time, Sheikh Mujib was always in touch with Hussain Shaheed Suhrawardy, who was in Pakistan. As a result, he directly joined the Awami Muslim League without any formality. He discussed with the leaders and activists and organized the Awami Muslim League council session at Mukul Cinema Hall in Dhaka on November 14. Maulana Abdul Hamid Khan Bhasani presided over the session. The event lasts for three days. Abul Mansoor Ahmed was the president of the reception committee in the session. After a long discussion, the following committee of Awami Muslim League was formed in the conference on November 16

President – Maulana Abdul Hamid Khan Bhasani

Vice President – Ataur Rahman Khan, Abul Mansoor Ahmad, Abdus Salam Khan and Khairat Hossain.

General Secretary – Sheikh Mujibur Rahman

Organizing Secretary – Korban Ali

Publicity Editor – Abdur Rahman

Office Secretary – Mohammad Ullah and Treasurer – Yar Mohammad Khan and many others.

In the second conference of Awami Muslim League, a decision was taken to form an electoral alliance with the opposition parties. Hossain Shahid Suhrawardy and Maulana Abdul Hamid Khan Bhasani were given the responsibility of nominating candidates for the election. Then the United Front was formed at the end of 1953. Awami Muslim League played a key role in the formation of the United Front.

In 1955, the annual conference of Awami Muslim League was held on September 21, 22, 23 at Rupmahal Cinema Hall, Sadarghat. On September 22, when Hossain Shahid Suhrawardy proposed to change the name of the party, it was approved by applause. The party was renamed Awami League after removing the word Muslim. Since then Awami League emerged as a non-communal secular and universal political party.

The importance of Awami League as the first opposition political party of East Bengal is immense. Under the strong leadership of this party, the language movement of 1952, the United Front elections of 1954. The movement against military rule of Pakistan in 1958, the six-point movement in 1966, the popular uprising of 1969, the huge victory in the 1970 elections and the 9-month armed struggle for independence in Bangladesh became the most popular party among the Bengali people.

Perspectives of Bayannar Language Movement

The history of Bengali torture by the ruling class since the independence of Pakistan is not a new phenomenon. The history of Bengalis from 1947 to 1952 is a history of extreme disappointment and deprivation. From the beginning, the Pakistani ruling class continued to exploit, torture and oppress the Bengali nation.

The ruling group indulged in a terrible conspiracy against the Bengalis to erase the Bengali national entity from history. They started the first conspiracy about Bengali language and Bengali culture. Speculation started from the very beginning among the central Muslim League leaders as to what would be the national language of Pakistan. The central leaders of the Muslim League and some Muslim intellectuals were in favor of making Urdu the only state language of Pakistan. The Bengali people became angry when the ruling group of Pakistan decided to make Urdu, the spoken language of 3.27% of the people, instead of Bengali, the spoken language of 56% of the entire Pakistan. As a result of the arbitrary attitude of the ruling class and unilateral decision-making regarding the issue of the national language, the people of East Bengal were motivated by nationalism to demand the protection of the Bengali language and Bengali culture. Thus, after the establishment of Pakistan, Bengali language alone was the first to incite the Bengali population in Bengali nationalism.

Constituent Assembly of East Bengal in language movement: Dhirendranath Dutta

Ever since the birth of Pakistan, Dhaka's students, teachers and intellectuals have been strongly protesting the demand of Bengali as the national language. In spite of this, English and Urdu languages are in use in the offices and courts on the orders of the government. Even if Urdu language is used in postcards, envelopes, etc., Bengalis are greatly offended and shocked and they become vocal in demanding Bengali as the national language.

On September 1, 1947, in the face of the East Bengal student movement, a three-member 'Tamuddun Majlis' was formed under the leadership of Abul Kashem, a young professor in the physics department of Dhaka University. At that time they raised the demand to make Bengali the state language. After that, the Democratic Jubo League was formed. In 1947 Dr. Muhammad Shahidullah, Abul Kalam Shamsuddin, Dr. Enamul Haque and others raised a strong demand to make Bengali one of the national languages of Pakistan. But the Governor General of Pakistan Mohammad Ali Jinnah claimed Urdu as the bearer of Islamic culture and tradition and said that "Urdu alone will be the only state language of Pakistan." Those who create confusion in this regard are enemies of Pakistan."

Then on February 23, 1948, the Constituent Assembly session was held. Dhirendranath Dutta, a member of the Constituent Assembly elected from Comilla, proposed to use Bengali as the language of the Constituent Assembly along with Urdu. But the proposal was not implemented due to the opposition of Pakistan Prime Minister Liaquat Ali Khan and East Bengal Chief Minister Khawaja Nazimuddin. As a result, a strike was observed in all educational institutions in Dhaka on 26 and 29 February 1948. In 1948, the Sangram Parishad was formed with the students and teachers of Dhaka University and Bengali intellectuals to make Bengali the national language.

The convener of this struggle council was Shamsul Haque. As Dhirendranath Dutta's proposal was not accepted in the Constituent Assembly, the student community went on strike on March 11, 1948 throughout Bangladesh. Following this, the Muslim League government arrested many leaders including the convener of the Sangram Parishad, Shamsul Haque, Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman and Ali Ahad. After the arrest of the Sangram Parishad leaders, the students and people of East Bengal became more angry and went on strike on March 13 and 15 in protest.

In view of such a heated situation, when negotiations were going on between the Pakistani ruling circle and the Bengalis for the demand of Bengali as the state language, the Governor General of Pakistan Mohammad Ali Jinnah officially declared Urdu as the only state language of Pakistan on March 21, 1948 at the Race Course Maidan in Dhaka and on March 24 at the convocation ceremony of Dhaka University. The Bengali nation was deeply shocked by such arbitrary decision and declaration of the Governor General. On that day the students of Dhaka University strongly protested the announcement of Governor General Muhammad Ali Jinnah. He left the venue shaking the convocation ceremony with the sound of no or no.

48 Rajpath and the role of mass people and student society

Even though Bengali is spoken by 56% of the total population of Pakistan, on that day the father of Pakistan and his friend Prime Minister Liaquat Ali Khan declared Urdu as the national language spoken by 3.27% of the people. As a result, the ruling group became a divisive of the vast masses of Pakistan and the Bengali race. On September 28, 1950, Prime Minister Liaquat Ali Khan declared Urdu as the sole state language in the Basic Policy Report presented to the Constituent Assembly, and the whole of East Bengal erupted in protests. After that, when Liaqat Ali Khan was killed by the assailants, Khwaja Nazimuddin demanded to declare Bengali language as the state language along with Urdu language. On that day, Nazimuddin assured that he would present the demand of Bengalis as the national language in the Constituent Assembly. But regrettably, on January 26, 1952 in Paltan Maidan, he again declared Urdu as the only state language of Pakistan.

Bangabandhu's role in language movement

The Bengali nation was enraged by such declaration of Khwaja Nazimuddin. Then 30th January protest day and 31st January All-Party National Language Struggle Parishad was formed in Dhaka. All over the country, people from all walks of life along with students chanted slogans for the release of the prisoners and 'We want Bangla as the national language'. On February 4, students held a rally on the premises of Dhaka University, and on February 21, a strike and public meeting was announced in the whole of East Bengal. That day the imprisoned Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman was undergoing treatment at Dhaka Medical College Hospital. He advised all Chhatra League workers and Awami Muslim League leaders to carry out the program to make February 21 a success. As a result, Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman and Mohiuddin Ahmed were transferred from Dhaka Central Jail to Faridpur District Jail. There, Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman and Mohiuddin Ahmed started a hunger strike to demand the release of Bengali as the national language and the release of all prisoners in jail. Therefore, it is undeniable that Bangabandhu was adamant about the demand of language even from prison and gave instructions to his colleagues in various ways. The then Chief Minister of East Pakistan, Nurul Amin, issued Section 144 on February 20 in Dhaka city for one month and declared a ban on meetings and processions.

Bengali language movement and its dynamics during the Pakistani era Bayannar Language Movement

The role of mass people and student society in the Rajpath of February 11

The struggle against injustice on February 21, 1952 is a memorable day in the national life of Bengalis. The fearless struggling people and students of East Bengal violated Article 144 and met in the old Kalabhavan premises of Dhaka University with a procession. A decision was taken to break Section 144 on the proposal of student leader Abdul Matin in a meeting held in Amtala of the university under the chairmanship of student leader Gaziul Haque. On that day, a small peaceful procession of students of Dhaka University marched towards the Provincial Legislature in violation of Article 144, chanting the slogan 'I want Bangla as the national language'. The session of the Provincial Legislative Council was going on that day. When the peaceful procession of the students reached in front of the Medical College Hospital, the murderous police and EPR on the orders of the murderer Nurul Amin Sarkar fired indiscriminately on the procession. The militant student leader, MA class student Barkat, Salam, Jabbar and Badamtali commercial press owner's son Rafiq were killed in police firing. Besides, 17 more students and youths were injured.

The fire of rebellion was ignited in the entire Bangladesh in protest of the killing of students on February twenty-one. On hearing the news of shooting at the students' march, Maulana Abdur Rashid Tarkbagish and some members of the Provincial Constituent Assembly such as the editor of Azad newspaper and member of the Provincial Legislative Council Mr.

Abul Kalam Shamsuddin, Begum Anwara Khatun, Khairat Hossain left the session and attended the scene and resigned from the Constituent Assembly in protest against the brazen brutal attack by the police. . The next day on February 22, students and teachers, literary and intellectuals, workers and ordinary people across the country observed a full-day hartal demanding Bengali as the national language and violated Article 144. On that day Shafiur Rahman Shafiq and rickshaw driver Awal and many others were martyred by the police. Protesting against the brutal police brutality, the masses took to the streets in droves. Finally, the government saw that the situation was dire and was forced to declare Bengali as the state language in the face of public pressure.

Shahid Minar was built overnight by the students in the medical college hostel premises to keep the memory of the martyrs of the language movement alive and was inaugurated by the father of Shahid Shafiur Rahman. Then on February 26, Shahid Minar was officially inaugurated by the editor of Azad newspaper, Mr. Abul Kalam Shamsuddin. In no time, the minaret became an emotional gathering place for Bengalis, covered in flowers.

Identity and contribution of martyrs in language movement

The language movement is an important and unforgettable event in the national life of Bengalis. The history of killing Bengalis by the ruling group since the creation of Pakistan is not a new phenomenon. It was a brilliant protest by the fearless people and students of Bengal against the arbitrary and dictatorial policies of the Pakistani ruling class. In the end, the desired goal of the Bengalis was achieved in exchange for the blood of the martyrs through this protest. Those who, in the brutal firing of the police on 21 February during the language movement, enriched the mother tongue of Bengalis with their blood and established the right of Bengalis to speak Bengali, are Barkat, Salam and Jabbar, MA students of Dhaka University and the sons of the commercial press owner of Badamtali Rafiq. Moreover, on February 22 and 23, students, workers, writers, intellectuals, teachers and general public were on full day strike while Shafiqur Rahman Shafiq and many others were martyred in police firing.

Finally, it can be said that the history of Bengal's masses and students dyeing the streets with blood to establish the mother tongue as the state language is unprecedented in the world. That is why the people of Bengal remember 21st February with pride even today amid many sorrows and pains. It can be undoubtedly said that the contribution of language martyrs of Ekush will be forever remembered in the history of Bengali nation.

Role of women in society: In the language movement, the role of female students was very important along with the student society of East Bengal. They spontaneously participated in the language movement ignoring all the obstacles and obstacles of the conservative Muslim society of East Bengal. From the beginning of the language movement, the students of Dhaka University, the home of all movements in East Bengal, united with the students and played a helpful role in making the language movement dynamic and intense.

The Muslim League government rejected the proposal of Dhirendranath Dutta, the representative elected from Comilla in the Constituent Assembly. In protest of this in 1948, during the hartal in East Bengal, the students along with the girls spontaneously went on strike. The role of Begum Anwara Khatun, a member of the Legislative Council of East Bengal, along with the students, was unique in making the language movement universal. Not only that, he also played a strong role during the convocation ceremony of Dhaka University in 1948. In that event, the students protested against the declaration of Urdu as the only state language of Pakistan by the Governor General of Pakistan Mohammad Ali Jinnah; He supported it when he left the stage with a resounding no-no. Then the All-Party State Language Executive Council took a decision to observe State Language Day on 21st February. In preparation for this, along with the student society of East Bengal, the students also actively observed the flag day on February 11 and 13 along with the strike on February 4. Bangla When the political environment of East Bengal gradually became turbulent due to the demand of language movement, the government of murderer Nurul Amin on February 20 issued Section 144 for an indefinite period across the province. On February 21, 1952, along with students from all levels of schools and colleges in Dhaka city, female students took a small procession and appeared in the Kalabhavan premises of the university. Meanwhile, a small procession of students led by student leaders Gaziul Haque and Abdul Mateen rushed towards the Provincial Legislative Council chanting the slogan "Bangla Chai Mother Language". Dr. in the movement of that day. Sufia Khatun, Ahmed Anandamoyi and Banglabazar School girls appeared at Amtala of Dhaka University. When it was decided to violate Section 144, it was originally her plan to cross the police barricade with 4 female students along with 10 students at the forefront of the procession. The achievement of violating section 144 by breaking through the police barricade was celebrated by the students that day. From Gaziul Haque's statement, the presence of 52 women in violation of section 144 is known. At one point, when the government police forces stopped the students, the march of 10 students broke through the police cordon and proceeded towards the Constituent Assembly. At that time, Salam, Jabbar, Rafiq, Barkat were killed by the police forces of the murderer Nurul Amin Sarkar. The next day, on February 22 and 23, women and men and people from all walks of life in East Bengal, including Dhaka, took to the streets to hold a strike demanding Bengali as the national language. Many people were martyred in police firing that day. Instantly, mass awakening began in the whole of Bangladesh, including the capital Dhaka. Realizing the importance of the situation, Bengali was immediately forced to accept it as the state language. Finally, it can be said without a doubt that the united participation of students as well as men and women and people from all levels in the language movement made the language movement completely successful.

At that time the government of East Bengal

Dr. Halima Khatun who played a unique role in language movement. He was present at the Amtali meeting of Dhaka University with the students of Government High School, Banglabazar Girls School. When the procession moved towards the Provincial Legislative Council, the police first clashed with his party and they marched ahead in violation of Section 144. Moreover, Khaleda Khanam was at the forefront of another women's march towards the Constituent Assembly. Besides, there were women leaders of various women's organizations in Dhaka city such as poet Sufia Kamal, Begum Kamrunnahar Laili, Halima Khatun, Noor Jahan Morshed and Afsari Khanam played an important role in the language movement. Moreover, Professor Shamsunnahar Mahmud, Mrs. Leela Roy, Anwara Chowdhury and others sent a memorandum to the Chief Minister of East Bengal requesting the declaration of Bengali as the national language.

Regional history of language movement

The language movement of 1952 is one of the historical events in the national life of Bengalis. The popular uprising of 1969, the national elections of 1970 and the freedom struggle of 1971 are eternally bright in the history of the Bengali nation.

On February 21, 1952, when Dhaka University student society violated Article 144 and marched towards the Provincial Legislative Council, Dhaka University MA students Salam, Jabbar, Rafiq, Barkat and many others were martyred by police firing. When the news of the killing of students by the police spread like wildfire all over Bengal, the protests of the people of different regions intensified. Not only the middle class and working class people of the city participated in the language movement, but the general population of the village erupted in violent protests against the killing of the students and joined the movement in droves. As a result, the trial of the murder of Salam, Jabbar, Rafiq, Barkat Instead of parents in the demand, the demand of the people of Bangladesh turned into a mass demand. Strong condemnation of the student killings and protest marches from various districts of Bangladesh such as Comilla, Chandpur, Jessore, Noakhali, Khulna created a mass wave in the whole of Bangladesh. Similarly, in Brahmanbaria, Daudkandi, Munshiganj, Sibchar, Rajshahi, Maijdi, Rangpur, Sonaimuri, Khilpara, Khulna, Pabna, Chittagong, Tangail, Sandwip, Ishwarganj, Baliyuri and even in rural areas, mass marches were held to protest against student killings and to demand mother tongue, demanding Bengali as the national language. And the general public spontaneously participated in the protest. As a result, the demand for justice for student killing turned into mass demand in different regions of Bangladesh.

(1) On February 23, student strikes, hartals, marches and public meetings were held throughout East Bengal to protest the killing of students and demanded the resignation of the provincial cabinet. On the same day, a peace march led by the Muslim League in Narayanganj circumambulated the city and strongly protested the student killings.

(2) A 'Rashtra Bhasha Sangram Parishad' was formed in a public meeting held at Mymensingh on 22nd February and District Muslim League President Fakhruddin Ahmad presided over a public meeting held in the local town hall premises in the afternoon of the same day. The resolution adopted in this meeting demanded the resignation of the provincial cabinet along with protesting the student killings.

(3) A public meeting was held in Shirolistan village of Jessore district demanding Bengali as the national language. In the resolution adopted in the public meeting, strongly protesting the police torture and killing of students, demanding immediate acceptance of Bengali language as one of the national languages of Pakistan, the resignation of Nurul Amin government was demanded.

(4) In the public meeting held in Tangail on February 23, the killing of students in Dhaka and the police torture on the common people were strongly condemned and protested.

(5) On February 23, a full-day all-out hartal was observed in Comilla city to protest against the police firing and killing of students in a student procession in Dhaka on February 21 and 22. As a result, traffic in the city, shops, bazaars, cinema halls are all closed. The streets of Comilla city became completely deserted. The procession, which is about a mile long, goes around the various streets of the city and meets in a large meeting at the local town hall. Such an unprecedented public gathering has never been held before in the history of Comilla. Mir Zahirul Haque presided over the meeting. East Pakistan College Teachers Association Secretary Professor Abul Khair and many others spoke at the meeting. The resolution adopted by the meeting strongly condemned the police torture and demanded the resignation of the provincial cabinet and the transfer of Dhaka District Magistrate Qureshi, along with paying tribute to the martyrs.

Finally, it can be said that in the history of the world, no one had to shed fresh blood like Salam, Barkat, Rafiq Jabbar to establish the mother tongue as a state language. So today they are forever shining and forever remembered in the glorious history of Bengali nation.

First Shahid Minar

Bangladesh's first Shahid Minar was built overnight on February 23 in the premises of Dhaka Medical College Hotel to keep the memory of the immortal martyrs of the language movement forever. The next day on February 24, Shafiur Rahman's father inaugurated it. Then on February 26, Mr. Abul Kalam, the editor of Azad newspaper, formally inaugurated it Shamsuddin But regrettably, on that day, the reactionary regime demolished the Shahid Minar. But the blood of Shahid Minar, who has sprouted in the hearts of Bengalis, can ever be erased? After that, the present Shahid Minar was built according to the design and plan drawn by Hamidur Rahman, a prominent artist of Bengal, which stands tall bearing the testimony of time. This Shahid minar will be forever bright in the memory of Bengalis.

So every year twenty-one come to the pastures of Bengal, Jharapatar Afternoon. Poems are uttered by hundreds of voices in the midst of sorrow and pain Or song by song.
Stained in my brother's blood
February twenty one
Can I forget?

* First song - Abdul Ghaffar Chowdhury

Ekush's song, “Dried in my brother's blood

February 21, dyed in my brother's blood
can i forget
The tears of hundreds of childless mothers in February
can i forget
Twenty one February, painted in the blood of my golden country
can i forget
Wake up Nagini Wake up Nagini Wake up Kal Boshekhira
Today, Bashundhara is shaken by the protest against the killing of children
By killing the country's golden boy, can you still make the demands of the people in the crisis of change?
The first poem of twenty-one:
I have not come to cry, I have brought the demand for hanging
Here are those who gave their lives
At the foot of Krishnachura rising above Ramana
Where like a gill of fire
Here and there there are numerous flames of blood burning,
I did not come there to cry.
Today I am not overwhelmed with grief,
Today I am not mad with anger
Today I am anointed with the glory of blood.

Abdul Ghaffar Chowdhury's first song about 'Ekush' after the February 21 shooting incident: The song is "Ekush February, painted in my brother's blood, can I forget it?" Abdul Latif composed the first tune in this song. After returning to Dhaka from Karachi in 1954, Altaf Mahmud composed the tune again. Since then it became Ekushe Prabhatferi's song. At present only the song composed by Altaf Mahmud is sung. In 1954, the song was published in the Ekushe collection edited by Hasan Hafizur Rahman. The then government confiscated the song. The song became popular after Zaheer Raihan used it in his film Jeevan To Neya. After February 21 was recognized as International Mother Language Day, the reputation of this song started to increase in the international arena. The song has already been translated into Swedish and Japanese. It ranked 3rd in the list of best songs in Bengali language in the BBC audience survey.

First poem - I have not come to cry, I have brought a demand for hanging. Producer - Mahbub-ul-Alam Chowdhury

The All-Party National Language Struggle Council was formed in Chittagong to demand the establishment of Bengali as the national language. The convener of this committee was Mahbub-ul-Alam Chowdhury and the joint conveners were Chowdhury Harunur Rashid and MA Aziz. On February 21, 1952, a strike was observed in all educational institutions in Chittagong. The news of firing on students in Dhaka came to journalist-literater Khandkar Mohammad Ilyach, a member of the Central Rashtra Bhasha Sangram Parishad stationed in Chittagong. Mahbub-ul-Alam Chowdhury was suffering from fever at that time. So labor leader Chowdhury Harun Rashid and young Awami League leader MA Aziz acted as convenors. After hearing the news of the shooting, he composed the poem "Kande Asini, I Have Demanded Hanging". Due to illness, Mahbub-ul-Alam Chowdhury did not have the ability to write. He was reciting the lines of the poem and colleague Nanidhar wrote them down. This is the first poem of twenty-one.

Internationalization of Bengali language

The language movement was the first independence movement of Bengalis to create Bengali nationalism. As a result Bengali nationalism emerged among the Bengali speaking population. Just as Shahid Minar, established in exchange for the blood of the brave martyrs of the language movement, bears the testimony of today, Bengali language is playing a groundbreaking and important role in developing language consciousness in the international arena beyond the borders of Bangladesh.

No nation in the world had to shed blood like the Bengalis to establish their mother tongue as the state language. Judging from that aspect, the contribution of Bengalis is undeniable. In 1999, during the regime of Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina, the United Nations recognized the importance of the Bengali language movement and declared February 21 as 'International Mother Language Day'. Since then, 21 February has been recognized as 'International Mother Language Day'

Chapter Five

Autonomy and Freedom Movement of East-Bengal

Introduction:

On August 14, 1947, Mohammad Ali Jinnah became the Governor General of Pakistan and Liaquat Ali Khan became the Prime Minister. Khawaja Nazimuddin became the Chief Minister of East Bengal. When Jinnah died on 14 September 1948, Khwaja Nazimuddin was appointed Governor General of Pakistan and Nurul Amin became the Chief Minister of East Bengal. When Liaquat Ali Khan was assassinated in October 1951, Ghulam Muhammad was appointed Governor General of Pakistan and Khwaja Nazimuddin was appointed Prime Minister. But as a result of the conspiracy of Ghulam Muhammad, the government started to change one after another. During the reign of his successor Iskandar Mirza, this conspiracy took a more complex and naked form.

The general election of 1954 is an important event in the political history of Pakistan. After the creation of Pakistan in 1947, elected representatives of undivided India (1946) continued to administer the provincial government of Pakistan, but the constitution called for the holding of the so-called East Pakistan provincial elections in 1951. But the rulers of Pakistan were disheartened by the defeat of the ruling Muslim League in the Tangail by-election. As a result, the provincial chief minister of East Pakistan, Nurul Amin, announced the election of the East Bengal Provincial Legislative Council on the basis of universal adult suffrage in March 1954, using various pretexts. This election was held from March 8 to March 12.

Electoral system: The Pakistan Constituent Assembly amended the Electoral Rules of the Rule of India Act, 1935 in April 1952. The following are the election rules: (1) All citizens above 21 years of age can vote. (2) Elections shall be held by direct vote of citizens above 21 years of age. In order to keep the memory of the great Ekushey February forever, the election program of the United Front was arranged in 21 phases. With their united efforts, the United Front soon gained immense popularity against the Muslim League in East Bengal. The basic demands of the exploited and oppressed people of East Bengal, along with the 21 points given by the United Front, prioritized the demand for provincial autonomy and the establishment of Bengali as the state language. United Front's 21-point program or election manifesto

The victory of the United Front and the formation of the government

The 21-point election manifesto announced by the United Front reflects the hopes and aspirations of the people of East Bengal. Because it is the development of agriculture, education and jute industry in East Bengal, the establishment of Bengali as the state language and the construction of Shahid Minar by declaring February 1st as Martyrs' Day is reflected in the people's demand. In addition, it soon gained immense popularity as the 19 points included the demand for provincial autonomy for East Bengal. As a result, on March 10, 1954, the United Front won an absolute majority against the Muslim League in the East Bengal Provincial Council elections. In this election, out of 309 seats, the United Front won 300 seats and formed the provincial cabinet.

Election results

The United Front won 143 seats out of 237 seats in the election and became the largest party. Out of 72 seats reserved for non-Muslims, Congress won 24, Scheduled Federation 27, United Front 13, Christian Community 1, Buddhist Community 2, Communist Party 4, Independents 1. 37.19 percent voters cast their votes in the election.

By forming the Sher Bangla Fazlul Haque cabinet, Bengali was made one of the national languages, Martyrs' Day on February 21 and official

He accepted the proposal to make Burdwan House a 'Bangla Academy' and gave final approval along with the holiday announcement. The main goal of the United Front is was the achievement of provincial autonomy of East Bengal. The central government of Pakistan could not accept the huge victory of United Front from the beginning. Moreover, the demand for autonomy of the Bengalis was never taken seriously. After taking charge of the provincial government, the central government of Pakistan became very alarmed by the activities of the Haque cabinet.

Central rule was imposed in Bangladesh by disbanding the United Front cabinet: After the defeat of the United Front in the 1954 provincial assembly elections, members of the ruling party were enraged. So that the people of East Bengal could not enjoy the benefits of this election, they indulged in a conspiracy with the ruling clique of Karachi and the capitalist Baish family of the so-called West Pakistan. Due to their conspiracy, labor riots started in Adamji Patakle and Chandraghona. As a result, on the pretext of the failure of the provincial government, Governor General Ghulam Mohammad dissolved the United Front Cabinet. Issued Section 92(a) in Bangladesh. As a result, Chief Minister Shere Bangla. K Fazlul Haque was placed under house arrest and many political activists including Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman were arrested. Thus central rule was imposed in East Bengal.

Formation of Cabinet by Hussain Shaheed Suhrawardy: On 12 September 1956, Hussain Shaheed Suhrawardy became the Prime Minister of Pakistan. Not at the mercy of anyone but he was the head of the coalition cabinet of his party 'Awami League' in the central legislature and the Republican party. At that time, there was no other leader alive in the entire Pakistan to protect the unity and democracy of Pakistan. When the Awami League government was in power in the whole of Pakistan and in East Pakistan, the popularity of Awami League and Shaheed Suhrawardy increased rapidly due to many welfare works. When general elections were announced in Pakistan in early 1959, the entire nation began to dream of regaining democratic rights and establishing an elected democratic government. If this election was held, Hossain Shaheed Suhrawardy's Awami League party would have come to power. Fearing this, at the end of 1958, the bureaucrats and the army started a new conspiracy to kill democracy.

Ayub Khan's seizure of power: On October 7, 1958, at the instigation of Commander-in-Chief Ayub Khan, President Iskandar Mirza imposed martial law in the entire country and appointed Army Chief Ayub Khan as the Chief Martial Law Administrator. The 1956 constitution was declared null and void. What is the cruel irony of Adarsh On October 27, 1958, General Ayub Khan removed Iskandar Mirza and took away the presidency by force. Iskandar Mirza was forced to leave the country. The history of Pakistan after this is very unfortunate. During the rule of Ayub Khan, the lamp of democracy was extinguished. The iron rule of one man was established in the country. All the opposition political leaders especially Hossain Shaheed Suhrawardy, the old public leader and mansaputra of democracy, were kept in the blind cell of the jail.

Constitutional structure of Pakistan

Pakistan gained independence on August 14, 1947. According to the Indian Independence Act of 1947, the Constituent Assembly was formed to frame the constitution. But as a result of the palace conspiracy of the Muslim League ruling class, no constitution was framed before March 23, 1956. The history of constitution making is as follows

First Constituent Assembly: The first Constituent Assembly was formed to frame the constitution of newly independent Pakistan. The number of members of this Constituent Assembly was 69 people. Later, 10 members from indigenous states and tribal areas were included, bringing the number of members to 79. Out of this, East Pakistan had 44 members. On September 28, 1950, the Interim Report presented by the Fundamental Policy Committee to the First Constituent Assembly proposed making Urdu the state language of Pakistan, and the people of East Bengal erupted in protests against it. As a result, this report was not discussed in the Constituent Assembly. The second report of the Principles Committee was subsequently presented to the Constituent Assembly on 22 December 1952 by Prime Minister Khawaja Nazimuddin. But it was not discussed due to strong opposition. When Muhammad Ali of Bogra became Prime Minister, he presented the third report of the Principles Committee known as the Muhammad Ali Formula. At that time, the Constituent Assembly tried to define and limit the powers of Governor General Ghulam Mohammad, but Ghulam Mohammad dissolved the first Constituent Assembly on 24 October 1954.

Second Constituent Assembly

The second Constituent Assembly was formed with 80 members. The Second Constituent Assembly framed the constitution in 1956 and the Second Constituent Assembly of Pakistan was formed on 23 March 1955. 40 from East Pakistan and 40 from West Pakistan. This constitution declared Pakistan an 'Islamic Republic' and established a federal and parliamentary government.

Reasons for the failure of the 1956 constitution

The 1956 constitution failed due to various reasons. Due to the absence of well-organized political parties, non-establishment of party discipline, unnecessary interference in the work of the cabinet by the head of state, reluctance to hold by-elections and general elections, etc., this constitution could not be effective. However, the conspiracy of the bureaucrats and the army was the main reason for the failure of the 1956 constitution. The leader of this circle, Iskandar Mirza and General Ayub

Khan, on October 8, 1958, declared the constitution of 1956 null and void and introduced military rule in the country.

General Ayub Khan was determined to strengthen his power base after assuming the post of President. On 28 October, he issued a military order to abolish the post of Prime Minister of Pakistan and assumed the office of President himself. In another order he banned all activities of all political parties in Pakistan and canceled the pre-announcement of general elections to be held in February 1959. Then he formed a cabinet with 11 members to govern the country. He adopted various schemes to strengthen the foundation of his rule.

Fundamental Democracy: One of the schemes adopted by him was the fundamental democracy framework. Within a year of assuming power, he issued the Basic Democracy Ordinance. The Basic Democracy Ordinance enjoins the creation of 4 tiered local autonomy. It is said that 40 thousand in East Pakistan and 40 thousand in West Pakistan, a total of 80 thousand representatives will be elected by direct vote of the people. These 80,000 basic democrats are empowered to elect the President, elect members of the National and Provincial Legislatures, and govern the Union Council. Among the total population of Pakistan, these 80,000 union level representatives will be considered basic democrats. A four-tiered structure is created in local government management through the Basic Democratic Order.

In this management, the lowest level of basic democracy was union committee in municipal areas and town committee in small towns. Union council boundaries were determined based on the population of 10,000 to 15,000. The second level of basic democracy was the Thana Council. The next stage of Thana Council was District Council which has 40 members. The highest level of basic democracy was the departmental council with 45 members. Under this management, 80,000 basic democrats were elected at the union level across the country through a general election on January 11, 1960. On February 14, 1960, General Ayub Khan was elected President of Pakistan for five years by a vote of confidence (yes or no) of these 80,000 basic democrats.

Failure of basic democracy: The basic democratic management introduced by President Ayub Khan in the name of democracy was just a political farce. In this management the Union Council was a local autonomous body but the government control over it was strong. Government officials were vested with the power to supervise all the functions of the Council. The power of government bureaucrats was so extensive that they could dissolve the council if necessary. Basic democracy was founded on the misconception that the people were uneducated, ignorant and unfit for democracy. This management is just an attempt to establish democracy in the country by creating a self-interested party. President Ayub Khan created fundamental democrats to hold the support of the people in a very clever way to stay at the foot of power where not fundamental was just a political gimmick. Democracy was not democracy. People had no support for his election system. It was to stay in power

The people of the country could not accept this election method of President General Ayub Khan. As a result, the voting rights of the people are limited. Because the people are deprived of the power to elect the members of the legislature or elect the president. As a result, the people of Pakistan quickly became angry against this novel system. The Constitution of 1962 declared the President 'an Islamic Republic'. General Ayub Khan issued the 'Constitution Order' of 1962 to Pakistan to quell popular discontent.

Constitution of 1962: The second constitution of Pakistan was made in 1962 during the regime of President Ayub. This government was established. The constitution declares Pakistan an "Islamic Republic" and is ruled by a presidential rather than a parliamentary democracy

Basic democracy

President Ayub implemented 'fundamental democracy' in 1960. Among the schemes adopted by him, basic democracy was limited as a result of the people's suffrage. Because the people were deprived of the power to elect the members of the legislature or the president in the 1965 presidential election. As a result, the people of Pakistan quickly became angry against this novel system.

In 1965, the presidential election was held in Pakistan. Ayub Khan was the candidate of the self-proclaimed Convention Muslim League. The opposition parties fielded Jinnah's sister Fatima Jinnah as their candidate against Ayub Khan. But Ayub Khan won the election by the votes of the fundamental democrats loyal to Ayub Khan won needless to say, when Ayub Khan won the election, anti-Ayub sentiments increased in Pakistan. Because Fatima Jinnah would have won if there was a direct vote by the people. Due to the duality of power in both parts of Pakistan from the beginning, the imbalance of state power became extreme during Ayub Khan's rule. Lack of proper political leadership led to economic stagnation in both parts of Pakistan under military-civilian administration. As a result, the sad picture of the extreme deprivation and neglect of the Pakistan government in all areas of East Bengal is exposed. The people of East Pakistan became angry to get out of this situation. Meanwhile, the Pak-India war of 1965 started.

Background of 1965 Indo-Pak war

Since the birth of the state of Pakistan in 1947, the reactionary permanent ruling group of Pakistan has been active in making East Bengal a colony of Pakistan. That's why from the beginning they started to use various tricks against East Bengal. First they started conspiracy against Bengali language and culture. Then the ruling class conspired to establish the central capital of Pakistan, military headquarters and factories in West Pakistan, creating a mountain of inequality in almost all areas. As a result, the Bengalis became very angry and began to think of the ruling class as enemies.

The imposition of military rule in Pakistan in 1958 was also the result of a deep conspiracy by the ruling group. Then by framing the constitution in 1962, they created an imbalance of power in both parts of Pakistan. In this constitution, the President-ruled system of government was introduced and all the executive powers of the Republic were assigned to the President. As a result, President Ayub Khan became the absolute executive power of Pakistan. President Ayub Khan handed over key cabinet positions to non-Bengalis and West Pakistanis in an executive power. As a result, the influence of military and civilian officials in the policy-making departments of the state increased without limit. The high-ranking officials in the military and civil departments of the Pakistani regime were all West Pakistanis. No high-ranking officers and employees were appointed from among Bengalis in the military and civil departments. As a result it was equally impossible for Bengalis to participate in all those posts. Ayub Khan's rule saw extreme imbalance of power in the state governance of Pakistan. As a result, the extreme imbalance of the ruling class in Pakistan's political leadership, military organization, civil administration system, state policy determination, and even the construction of the economic structure was revealed and the sad picture of deprivation and neglect towards East Bengal was exposed. The Pakistan-India war broke out on September 6, 1965 over the question of possession of Kashmir at the very moment when there was extreme disorder in the political sphere of Pakistan.

Pak-India war level: Sheikh Abdullah was the leader of Kashmir then. When the Indian government arrested him and imprisoned him, there was great tension in Indian-controlled Kashmir. As a result of which extreme anarchy was created in Kashmir. Ayub Khan took advantage of this chaos to occupy Kashmir and conducted a military campaign there. India from far east 1. An organization called the Jammu and Kashmir Revolutionary Council was formed to counter the government. Mujahideen forces in Kashmir with the help of Pakistan Army and Revolutionary Council have infiltrated into Indian controlled Kashmir and carried out sabotage activities.

starts Then the Pakistan Army entered Indian-controlled Kashmir on September 6, and the Pak-India war began. The Pakistan Army built a strong defense system early on. Later, the Indian army crossed the international border and advanced towards Lahore without being able to break through Pakistan's resistance. Their objective was to capture Pakistan's Lahore

The Pakistani Army was successful in the Kashmir border sector, but was defeated later on. In this war, Pakistan military forces suffered huge losses. Different donor countries of the world came forward after noticing the intensity of Pak-India war. Finally, the 17-day war between India and Pakistan ended on 23 September with the help of the United Nations. Then on January 10, in the meeting held between Pakistan President General Ayub Khan and Indian Prime Minister Lal Bahadur Shastri, the 'War Not Peace' agreement was signed in the city of Tashkent in the Soviet Union. The Indo-Pak war of 1965 created a negative reaction in the politics of Pakistan. Arms worth billions of dollars were destroyed in the war. A large number of army soldiers were injured and lost their lives in the war. India-Pakistan occupied several parts. The people of Pakistan became angry against the Ayub regime as Pakistan accepted the defeat of the war and the Kashmir problem was not mentioned in Article 9 of the 'Tashkhand Peace' agreement. Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, the leader of Pakistan's opposition political party PP, continued to campaign and blame Ayub Khan's weakness and cowardice for Pakistan's defeat. As a result of Pakistan's defeat, doubts and skepticism arose in the public mind about the strength and capabilities of the army.

As a result of Pakistan's defeat in the war, the anti-Ayub movement throughout Pakistan added a new dimension to the politics of East Pakistan. East Pakistan was completely undefended during the Indo-Pak war. India could have occupied East Pakistan if it wanted. As a result, the people of East Pakistan became aware of the defense system of the eastern region. During the 17-day war, severe food shortages occurred in the eastern region due to severe communication. As a result, the price of daily necessities increases abnormally. Bengalis were able to understand clearly from the point of view of the ruling class that they were very helpless during the war. Bengali soldiers sacrificed their lives on the Lahore front but did not receive any 'valour', causing frustration and anger among the Bengali soldiers. As East Pakistan was completely unprotected by water, land and air during the war, Sheikh Mujibur Rahman, the leader of the opposition in East Bengal, proposed the formation of separate militias for the two regions of Pakistan. Then he announced a 6-point program to demand the independence of East Bengal. The six-point demand announced by Sheikh Mujibur Rahman, the leader of the opposition Awami League in East Bengal, was soon hailed as the Magna Carta of the Bengali nation.

Location of East Pakistan

From the beginning, the economic discrimination created by Pakistanis with the aim of colonizing East Bengal, the plan to develop Bengali language and culture made the people of East Bengal angry. In addition, President Ayub Khan's policy of centralization of power and the seizure of power by non-Bengali military and civilian officials and the illegal activities of fundamental democrats throughout the society made the people of East Bengal anti-Ayub demanding autonomy. After the death of Hossain Shaheed Suhrawardy, the National Democratic Front became inactive in 1964, Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman Maulana Abdur Rashid Awami League was reorganized under the leadership of Tarkabagish. Then Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman put forward four main demands for the constitutional reform of Pakistan. Namely-- 1. Drafting of new constitution of Pakistan to establish parliamentary democracy, 2. Regional autonomy, 3. Increasing military power in East Pakistan and 4. Headquarters of Pakistan Navy established in Chittagong. The demands made by the Awami League were the demands for the lives of the people of East Bengal. As a result, the movement for people's autonomy added a new dimension. Maulana Bhasani and Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman emphasized provincial autonomy and parliamentary democracy in their speeches at the public meeting at Shahid Minar on 21 February 1964. At this time, instead of basic democracy, people's movement continued to demand universal direct suffrage. As the demand for autonomy of the people of East Bengal became more prominent, the repression of the dictator Ayub Khan increased. East Bengal is in such a critical moment

In February 1966, Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman announced his historic six-point programme. The main goal of Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur's six-point program was provincial autonomy.

Six-point and its importance

When East Pakistan was exploited, humiliated and deprived in all aspects by the West Pakistani bureaucrats, capitalists and army, Awami League President Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman presented a historic 6-point program at the conference of the opposition parties held in Lahore on February 5-6, 1966.

The six-points were as follows:

(1) Pakistan should be made into a real United States by drafting a constitution based on the historic Lahore Resolution and the government of this United States would be parliamentary in nature. The Central and Provincial Legislatures will be constituted by the vote of all adults on the basis of universal suffrage. East Pakistan will have proportional representation in the Central Legislature.

(2) The United States government shall have only national defense and foreign affairs. In all remaining matters the states or provinces shall have full power.

(3) There shall be two separate but easily interchangeable currencies for two regions of the country or the same currency for one region of the country. However, the constitution should have such a system that the currency and capital of one region cannot be smuggled to another region.

In this provision there will be a Federal Reserve Bank in Pakistan. Two Regional Reserve Banks in two regions will be

(4) The power to levy and collect all taxes, fees and charges shall be vested in the Regional Government. However, the central government will get a part of the money collected for meeting the central government expenditure.

(5) States shall have full control over foreign exchange. State governments can negotiate and make agreements about foreign trade and aid.

(6) States may maintain para-military forces as an effective means of safeguarding regional integration and national security.

Six-point importance

The six-point was the Bengali's demand for self-determination. The six-point program that Bari drew up that day was based on the Bengali nationalist thought and consciousness that was born through the language movement on 21 February. The six-point program gave strength to the Bengali nation, which was plunged in darkness, to struggle. Encouraged to speak out against autocratic and anti-people rulers. As the Ayub government brutally suppressed Bengali nationalism and Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman's six-point movement, the movement grew rapidly. This resulted in the mass movement of 1969 and the unprecedented victory of the Awami League in the 1970 elections. In reality the six-point was the Bengali Emancipation Charter, the Bengali Magna Carta.

June 7 Programme: The six-points given by the Awami League soon became the vital demand of the people of East Bengal and gained immense popularity. Governor Monem Khan arrested many activists, including eight prominent Awami League leaders, under the National Defense Act, noting the huge enthusiasm and enthusiasm of Bengalis for the six-point movement. A province-wide strike was observed under the leadership of the Awami League on June 7, 1966 to stop the government's imprisonment and unjust harassment. To make the six-point program a success, people in large numbers violated Article 144 and participated in the June 7 procession. As a result, the police opened fire on the procession. Many people died in police firing in this movement. Hundreds of people were killed and thousands of workers were imprisoned. However, the movement continued at a steady pace.

Historic Agartala case [State vs. Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman and others]

Since the birth of the state of Pakistan, the discriminatory policies of the West Pakistanis have angered the people of East Pakistan. Discriminatory treatment and economic exploitation of West Pakistanis in all areas widens the gap between the two parts of Pakistan. At that time Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman was the undisputed leader of the disaffected people of East Pakistan. He was regarded as a beloved leader of the people of East-Bengali who protested against the discriminatory treatment and exploitation policies of the Pakistani government. His uncompromising and strong voice in demanding the demands of the oppressed people soon made him a popular leader of East Bengal. As his popularity grew in East Pakistan, the despotic Ayub-Monaim government became apprehensive about his future and repeatedly arrested and imprisoned him through trickery and trickery to stifle his political activities. But even then, Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman did not deviate from his political philosophy at all. As his political acumen and popularity grew day by day, people from various professions especially the young Bengali members of the downtrodden and downtrodden military forces came into contact with him. While talking to them, Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman at one point thought about armed revolution. At one time in 1962, Lieutenant Commander Moazzem Hussain of the Pakistan Navy met him with a group of soldiers under his command. They discussed their armed movement with Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman. After some time, Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman secretly traveled to Tripura. At that time he had a meeting with Congress leader and later Chief Minister of Tripura Sachindralal Singh in Tripura's capital Agartala. It was through this meeting that he sent a message to Indian Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru seeking help in the armed movement. Then in 1966 Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman gave six-point When the program gained wide popularity in East Pakistan, the demand for autonomy of the people of East-Pakistan turned into a popular demand. On the other hand, due to the discrimination and dissatisfaction in the military, some Bengali officers secretly started organizing for armed revolution. But soon it was revealed to intelligence agencies. When the incident of armed revolution came to light, around one and a half thousand Bengalis were arrested all over Pakistan. Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman was accused as the main defendant for this and a total of 35 people including 28 people were registered in Agartala. At that time, Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman was in jail. However, the case was filed on 18 January 1968. The case was alleged to have been planned to liberate East Pakistan through an armed movement with the help of India, hence the name 'Agartala Case'. In official documents, the case is titled “State vs. Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman and others”. In the Agartala case, Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman and 35 people were accused. The list of their names was as follows; Lt Commander Moazzem Hossain, Steward Mujibur Rahman, LM Sultan Uddin Ahmed, Noor Mohammad, Ahmed Fazlur Rahman CSP, Flight Sergeant Mofizullah, ABM Abdus Samad, Habildar Dalil Uddin Hawladar, Ruhul Quddus CSP, Flight Sgt. Fazlul Haque, Bhupati Bhushan Chowdhury, Bidhan Krishna Sen, Subedar Abdur Razzak, Habildar Mujibur Rahman, Flight-Sergeant Abdur Razzak, Sergeant Zahurul Haque, ABM Khurshid Khan, Shamsur Rahman CSP, Risaldar AKM. Shamsul Haque, Habildar Azizul Haque and others.

On April 21, 1968, the former judge of the Supreme Court Mr. M.A. A special tribunal was constituted under the leadership of Rahman. The other two judges of the tribunal were MR. Khan and Muqsumul Hakim. Former Foreign Minister Manzoor Quader and Advocate General T.H.Khan were on behalf of the Government of Pakistan. Renowned lawyer Sir Thomas William from the United Kingdom filed an application in the High Court challenging the validity of the special tribunal on behalf of Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman on August 5.

On June 19, 1968, the case of State vs. Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujib and others started under heavy guard at Kurmitola cantonment. The main goal of this case was to hang former Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujib as a traitor. But inside the Kurmitola cantonment, the farcical case of government fraud continued. Outside then, the protests of the people of the whole country started to burn like sparks. In such a situation, when Zahurul Haque, one of the accused in the Agartala case, was shot dead in the name of justice, protests spread like wildfire in the entire country, including Dhaka. The mass uprising of 1969 erupted into violent protests in East Pakistan when crowds paraded the streets carrying his body, Sgt. In order to save Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman from the violent attacks of the despotic Ayub government, the people of Bengal took to the streets, ignoring jail-oppression, torture-shots-torture and Article 144. Bengal began to vibrate with procession after procession of people and sky-scraping slogans. Despite the tyranny and torture of the government, this movement took the form of a popular uprising in 1969. Finally, on February 22, Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman and his colleagues were released from prison unconditionally. On the occasion of the unconditional release of the undisputed leader of Bengal, Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman, on February 23, 1969, the All-Party Chhatra Sangam Parishad organized a mass reception at Dhaka's Race Course Maidan. During the felicitation ceremony, the respected members of Dhaka University's Student Struggle Council awarded him the title of Bangabandhu.

Discrimination against Bangladesh during the Pakistani era

Even though East Bengal and West Pakistan created a single country, Pakistan, the Bengalis did not get equal attention and sympathy from the Pakistani rulers. From the very beginning, the government of Pakistan was following the policy of discrimination against Bengalis in administrative, political, military and economic fields. As a result, a huge financial gap was created between West Pakistan and East Pakistan. From 1947-48 to 1967-68, the disparity becomes evident from the income and expenditure accounts available in various sectors of Pakistan.

(a) Discrimination in Administrative Fields : Administrative discrimination was found in the number of Bengali government employees at various levels during the Pakistani regime. Despite the large Bengali population, the number of employees was several times greater than that of West Pakistanis. Administrative deprivation severely hampered the development trend of East Pakistan. Discrimination was evident in higher positions and recruitment.

(b) Political Discrimination : Bengalis were more in terms of population. But the Pakistani government was suspicious of East Pakistan's demand for autonomy and the introduction of democratic processes. But with the spirit of compromise, the Bengalis accepted the number-equality policy in the council despite the majority. But the then rulers of Pakistan did not want to give privileges to the majority of Bengalis in the field of military-civilian jobs according to this policy. The insurable treatment in the employment of permanent vested interests is given below:

বিভিন্ন বিভাগ	পূর্ব পাকিস্তান	পশ্চিম পাকিস্তান

As of 1966, the statistics of East and West Pakistan in the administrative system of Pakistan were as follows:

১ম শ্রেণি	২,৮১৬ জন	২,১০৪ জন	৭১২ জন	২৩%

৩য় শ্রেণি	৭০,০০০ জন	৫০,৭০০ জন	১৯,৩০০ জন	২৭%
৪র্থ শ্রেণি	২৬,০০০ জন	১৮,০০০ জন	৮,০০০ জন	৩০%

From 1947-48 to 1968-69, Pakistan's total expenditure on the civil sector was 718 crore rupees. Out of which only 184 crore rupees are spent in East Pakistan. Ever since the establishment of the state of Pakistan, the self-interested Pakistani ruling class has imposed a policy of indiscriminate discrimination against East Pakistan, which is very rare in the history of the world.

(c) Military disparity : The military disparity between the two regions was very high. There were three headquarters of the Defense Forces in West Pakistan. Arms factories were also there. Defense Force jobs were almost exclusively for West Pakistanis. 70 percent of the annual income was spent on the defense sector and the West Pakistanis were the full beneficiaries of this money. There were very few Bengalis in the high ranks of the army.

(d) Economic disparity: Financial disparity was one of the main reasons for the misery of Bengalis. As the currency and economy were in the hands of the central government, the income of Bangladesh could easily flow to West Pakistan. All the banks including industrial trade, government and private institutions, state banks, national banks had their head offices in West Pakistan and money laundering continued freely. That is why capital could not be developed in Bangladesh. Although the industrial raw materials are produced in this region, the industrial establishments are established in West Pakistan. The industry of West Pakistan was built up by the foreign exchange earned from jute and tea. Most of the foreign loan and aid money was spent in West Pakistan. Bangladesh became a colony in West Pakistan due to discrimination policy in various fields. When the picture of Pakistani rulers' discrimination came to light, Bengalis were naturally outraged. Not a single country can be found in the world, where one region of the same state is subjected to such massive economic exploitation and cultural oppression by another region. Gradually the Bengalis protested and the demand for rights became vocal.

Discriminatory policy

The history of the rule of Pakistan from August 14, 1947 to March 26, 1971 is the history of the oppression of the East Pakistani Bengali people by the West Pakistani rulers. At this time East Pakistan became a colony of West Pakistan. The first capital of Pakistan, Karachi, was built mainly with the foreign currency earned by East Pakistan. When the second capital of Pakistan was built in Islamabad, East Pakistan also bore the brunt of the cost. But the West Pakistani rulers gave priority to West Pakistan in terms of expenditure. 94% of the total revenue was spent in West Pakistan as the Ministry of Defense and Central Government offices were located in West Pakistan. All wealth was concentrated in the hands of 22 wealthy families of West Pakistan. The disparity was even more painful in military, civilian and other jobs. In the Central Foreign Office, West Pakistanis were 85% but Bengalis were only 15%, in the Army, West Pakistanis were 95% but Bengalis were only 5%, in the armed forces the number of West Pakistanis was 5,00,000 but the number of Bengalis was negligible. The few factories that were established in Bangladesh were owned by West Pakistani capitalists. In this way, it can be seen that the injustice and deprivation of the people of East Pakistan in the field of industry, trade and employment was increasing gradually. Because of this discriminatory treatment, the people of East Pakistan were called for autonomy and freedom from economic exploitation. Bangabandhu was quickly drawn to Sheikh Mujibur Rahman's 6-point programme. Because the 6-point program is provincial Due to the torture and exploitation of the people of East Pakistan by the Pakistani ruling group, the mass movement was formed in 1969.

Ayub-Monaim Khan's dictatorship ended in this mass movement. They were thrown into the dustbin of history by the people.

The 1969 mass uprising

The long twenty-three years history of Bengal during the Pakistani regime is very diverse and painful. Another bright protest of the oppressed people of Bengal against the rule, exploitation, tyranny and torture of the despotic ruling circle since the creation of Pakistan was the 1969 mass uprising. As the Awami League's six-point movement gained popularity in East Bengal, the authoritarian Ayub Sarkar became alarmed. The Ayub-Monayem clique arrested Awami League and Chhatra League workers across the province in order to stop this movement of Awami League. After that, jail, oppression and torture started on them.

Then the torture and oppression of the government started on the students of West Pakistan. Violent protests by the people of East and West Pakistan against the repressive policies of the dictatorial government ignited across the country. Then Maulana Bhasani called for the observance of 'Resistance' Day on December 6 across the country. Maulana Bhasani besieged the Governor's House ignoring the obstruction and lathi charge by the police.

Maulana Abdul Hamid Khan Bhasani

On December 7, 1968, Maulana Bhasani declared a strike. Hartal was observed in entire Bangladesh including Dhaka. All political institutions, student organizations, intellectuals, farmers-labourers and journalists participated in the procession to observe the hartal. As a result of police firing during the strike, 4 people were killed, 30 people were injured and more than a hundred people were arrested.

Chhatra Sangmar Parishad: Chhatra Sangmar Parishad held mourning processions with strikes across the country on January 21, 22 and 23 in protest against Asad's murder. In order to turn this movement into an all-out movement, the Sangram Parishad circled the streets of Dhaka city with black flags along with the blood-stained clothes of Shaheed Asad at the forefront of the procession. As a result, thousands of people took to the streets to protest the killing of Assad. Instantly, Dhaka turned into a city of processions. On this day, 6 people were killed and 14 people were injured by the police forces of the dictatorial government. 37 people were killed in police firing in various parts of West Pakistan and hundreds were injured in various cities including the capital Karachi. When the Central Students' Struggle Parishad called a nationwide strike on January 24 in protest, the people's protests became violent throughout the country and the people's movement took the form of a mass movement.

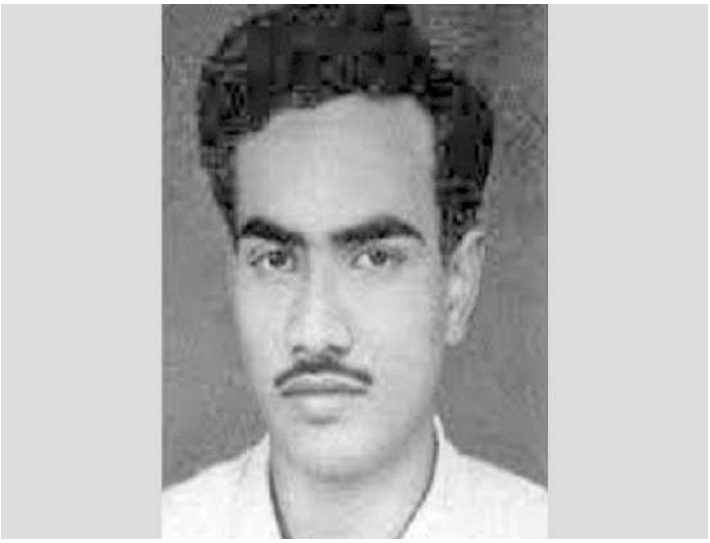

On January 24, people from all walks of life across the country, including students, spontaneously participated in the movement. As a result, the streets were flooded with people and created mass awakening. On that day, when the police fired again during the agitation, a ninth class student named Matiur Rahman and 3 people were killed in Khulna and many people were injured. The agitating people then got angry and set fire to the offices of the official newspaper Daily Pakistan and the English newspaper Morning News. As a result of continuous agitations in East Pakistan, the political situation went beyond the government's control, forcing the government to call in the army.

Sergeant Zahurul Haque: In the context of such a situation, on February 15, one of the accused in the historic Agartala case, Sergeant Zahurul Haque, was shot dead in the name of justice inside the cantonment.

Sergeant Zahurul Haque was a young officer of Pakistan Army. Since the creation of Pakistan, the Bengali officers and soldiers of the army could not accept the discriminatory policy of the ruling class. That is why they are motivated by patriotism to change their destiny through an armed revolution against the injustice and wrongdoing of the government. Sergeant Zahurul Haque was one of the leaders of this group. He knew that it was not easy to achieve this goal. However, Sergeant Zahurul Haque met his death with a smile in a fiery protest against the government's injustice. He was shot and killed in a farce in the name of justice. The pent-up anger of the people ignited like a spark against the death of Sergeant Zahurul Haque. Agartala case judge M.A. got angry with the protesting crowd. Rahman's residence was set on fire. On February 16, the mass movement spread like wildfire. On that day, Maulana Bhasani demanded the unconditional release of all the royal prisoners. Otherwise Bangabandhu threatened to release Sheikh Mujib by breaking the jail lock. The government imposed a curfew in view of the dynamic nature of the movement in East Bengal. On February 18, on the call of Rajshahi University's Chhatra Sangram Parishad, the students marched towards the main gate of the university with the conviction of breaking the curfew. University proctor Dr. Shamsujjoha rushed there on the news of students breaking curfew and sent the students back to the university again advising them not to break curfew. At that time an army jeep came there and asked his identity. Dr. Despite Shamsujoha identifying himself, the narcissist shot him to the ground and then killed him with a bayonet charge. Everyone was stunned by such demonic behavior of the Pakistani army officer and all the students and teachers present broke down in tears. 18 February Dr. In protest against the assassination of Shamsujjohar, the movement gained momentum throughout Bangladesh. The people of East Pakistan became angry against the killings and torture of the dictatorial government. On January 4, 1969, the All-Party Student Struggle Parishad started an eleven-point movement. When the eleven points of the students were combined with the six points, the momentum of the movement intensified. Monayem Khan's N. S. The student organization called F was disbanded. To deal with a dire situation in the country, the opposition parties formed the Democratic Struggle Council based on 8 points. On January 20, 1969, a nationwide strike was held to protest the attack on the university by the police force of the dictatorial government. On that day, Asaduzzaman, a law student of Dhaka University, was killed by the police. The popular uprising of 1969 is a glorious achievement in our national life. So 'seventy-nine' like twenty-one has become a symbol of Bengali nationalism. One of the heroes of this symbol was Shahid Asad, the dying student leader of Dhaka University. He is the son of Alhajj Maulana Mohammad Abu Taher (B.A BT) Saheb, a resident of Dhanua village under Shibpur Police Station under present Narsingdi District.

After passing Intermediate in 1963, he got admission in BA Honors in Department of History in Dhaka University. After completing matriculation from Shibpur High School in 1960, he joined Sylhet MC College. From there he received BA Honors in History in 1966 and MA in 1967. In the same year, he was admitted to the LLB class in City 'Law' College and was brutally martyred by an assassin's gun while still a student of 'Law'.

On January 20, 1969, Amanullah Mohammad Asaduzzaman, a young student leader in Talkbag who firmly believed in the establishment of an exploitation-free society, was brutally martyred by the police while protesting against the injustice of the then dictator Ayub Monaem's regime. Assad's martyrdom sparked the mass protests of the 1960s, and in just four days of protests, the ruling dictator
Ayub Khan fell.

Release and title of Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman: Unable to stand in front of this popular movement of students and people, the autocratic Ayub government surrendered to the people and unconditionally released all the prisoners including Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman on February 22. After his release from prison, Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman addressed a public gathering at the historic Race Course Maidan. Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman was conferred the title of 'Bangabandhu' on 23rd February 1969 by the Chhatra Sangram Parishad at the race course reception.

Round Table Meeting: President Ayub Khan called a round table meeting in Rawalpindi to resolve the political problems of Pakistan. Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman participated in the Rawalpindi meeting. But he left the meeting and returned to East Bengal as the historic six-point demand of the Bengali nation's liberation charter failed to prevail in the round table meeting. Ayub Khan's governor of Tabedar, Monayem Khan, was removed on March 20 as the tide of mass agitation intensified. Finally, on March 25, President Ayub handed over power to General Yahya by imposing military rule in the face of massive public protests. Thus the Ayub-Monayem cycle was removed in the face of the movement of the struggling people of East Bengal.

General election in 1970

Announcement of election date: On March 25, 1969, the dictatorial Ayub regime came to an end with the imposition of military rule for the second time.In his place, General Agha Mohammad Yahya Khan, the Chief Military Administrator (CMLA) of Pakistan, assumed the duties of the Head of State. Soon after assuming power, Yahya Khan announced 5th October 1970 as the date for the election of the National Assembly. The October elections have already become impossible due to floods in East Bengal.

Allocation of Seats: Yahya Khan issued the Legislative Framework Order on March 30 to fix the number of seats in the National Assembly at 313. Then on the basis of equality of numbers, the seats of the National Assembly were divided into two parts, 169 in East Pakistan and 144 in West Pakistan. The number of seats in the provincial council is fixed at 300. Dec 7, 1970 announced the date of National Assembly election and December 19 provincial council election and issued an order banning all political activities and holding meetings from January 1.

Rulings' inaction on floods in East Pakistan: At a time when the National Assembly election campaigns in both provinces of Pakistan were going on at a steady pace, on November 12, 1970, the coastal areas of East Pakistan experienced the largest unprecedented floods in history. As a result, about 25 lakh people lost their lives prematurely in this flood. Just like the legend of history, when the news of the loss of lives of lakhs of people in Bhola, Sandwip, Hatia affected by this flood, then all the sensible people of the world came forward by extending the hand of help and sympathy to the Bengalis in their distress. But the cruel truth is that not only the rulers of Pakistan came forward. It deeply shocked the Bengali nation. In addition, Vice Admiral SM Ahsan, the governor of East Pakistan, unsuccessfully requested helicopter assistance from the West Pakistan government to send urgent relief supplies to the flood-affected areas. Bengalis became aware of their future with such inferiority and inaction of the Pakistani ruling class

Awami League's victory in the election: December 7, 1970 is the day of ultimate fate of Bengali nation and Pakistan. The general election of the National Assembly of Pakistan was held on this day. Awami League and other political parties actively participated in the elections. The Awami League won 167 out of 169 seats in the National Assembly elections and achieved an absolute majority and won 288 seats in the Provincial Assembly. On the other hand, People's Party was elected in 88 out of 144 seats in the National Assembly elections and was recognized as the second largest party. Pakistan's two largest parties won huge majorities in both regions, but neither was able to win a single seat in any region other than their own. However, in the general elections of 1970, Bangabandhu won an absolute majority in the national and provincial assemblies. Such instances are rare in the history of elections in the world. Pakistan's president Yahya Khan came to Dhaka with the huge victory of Awami League and Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman was named the 'future prime minister' of Pakistan; If called as, the future anxiety of Bengalis to take power is somewhat reduced. President Yahya fixed the date of the first session of the National Assembly in Dhaka on March 3, 1971. The Bengali nation was somewhat hopeful in this announcement.

Despicable Conspiracy of Pakistanis: But soon Yahya Khan's delusions arose on the advice of West Pakistani permanent self-interested leaders. The conspiracies of Western industrialists, bureaucrats and political leaders began. Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman asked Yahya Khan to fix the session date of National Assembly on February 15. But instead of doing that, he set the date of the session of the National Assembly on March 3 as said by Mr. Bhutto. After the date of National Assembly session is announced Mr. Bhutto said, "Unless there is a six-point reshuffle of the Awami League, he will not participate in the Dhaka session." In reply, Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman said, "If Bhutto Sahib's proposal is accepted, it will definitely be considered." In such a situation, Bhutto warned the elected National Assembly members of Pakistan not to attend the session in Dhaka.

The mastermind of the conspiracy, Yahya Khan, postponed the session of the National Assembly indefinitely by a proclamation on 1 March.

The sudden postponement of the date of the National Assembly session without any discussion with the leaders of the majority party made the Bengali people very unhappy and angry and the Bengalis had to jump into yet another movement to thwart the nefarious conspiracy of the Pakistani ruling class. A nationwide non-cooperation movement began.

Non-Cooperation Movement, 1971

Beginning of the Non-Cooperation Movement: The date of the first session of the National Assembly in Dhaka, which was to be held on March 3, was unexpectedly postponed indefinitely on March 1, and the Bengali nation erupted in protests. Many times in the past, they have destroyed the hopes and dreams of the Bengali nation. So this time the angry Bengali nation became bright with the oath of freedom to break the black hand of the conspiracy of the ruling circle. Angry students hoisted the Bangladeshi flag at Dhaka University on March 20 and pressured Bangabandhu to declare Bangladesh's independence. Meanwhile, a peaceful strike was observed across the country on March 2 and 3 at the call of Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman. During the peaceful procession, many people were injured in Rajshahi, Jessore, Chittagong, Khulna and Tongi areas of Dhaka due to firing by the military.

Calling for a strike and getting people's support: Bangabandhu called for a peaceful non-cooperation movement against the autocratic government in a public meeting called by Chhatra Sangram

Parishad at Dhaka's Paltan Maidan against military and police torture. Farmers, workers, intellectuals, students of Bengal responded to the call of this undisputed leader and jumped into the non-cooperation movement. Peaceful non-cooperation movement continued all over the country to protest the heinous atrocities of the tyrannical barbaric Yahya regime. Bangabandhu announced that factories, offices, courts, schools, colleges, railway wheels and public fares will be stopped until the demands of the Bengalis are met. He ordered to stop any money laundering from East Pakistan to West Pakistan. The people spontaneously obeyed the orders of their popular leader peacefully. Yahya Khan was disturbed to imagine the presence of another state in the middle of an independent state.

Yahya announced the date of the session on March 25: In view of this situation, Yahya Khan announced the date of the first session of the National Assembly on March 25 in Dhaka in his radio address on March 6. Then Lieutenant General Sahebzada Yakub Khan was removed from the post of military administrator of East Bengal and appointed Tikka Khan as the governor. But because of the non-cooperation movement in East Bengal, the High Court judge refused to take the oath.

Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman's historic speech on March 7 and imposition of conditions: Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman gave the greatest speech in the history of all time to the nation at a large public meeting at the race course on March 7 to protest against the handiwork of Yahya Khan. Which has been shining in its tradition in the history of Bengali independence. He declared, “This time struggle Our struggle for liberation, this struggle is the struggle for freedom, when I have given blood, I will give more blood, I will leave the country free, inshallah. Alarmed by Bangabandhu's speech, dictator Yahya Khan convened a domestic meeting of 12 leaders in Dhaka on March 10 and invited Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman. Bangabandhu declined the invitation following impose conditions:

(1) Martial law should be withdrawn first.

(2) The killing of innocent and helpless Bengalis by the army should be investigated. Power should be transferred to elected representatives.

(4) Army should take barracks.

Otherwise he ordered to continue the non-cooperation movement.

Significance of March 7 speech: When President Yahya Khan suspended the National Assembly session for an indefinite period without any reason, angry students hoisted the Bangladeshi flag at Dhaka University on March 2 and repeatedly pressed Bangabandhu to declare Bangladesh's independence. Under the pressure of students and crowd, Bangabandhu delivered his historic speech in a huge public meeting at Race Course Maidan in Dhaka on March 7. Bangabandhu's speech on March 7 became a cause of great concern and anxiety not only for the people of Dhaka or the Bengali nation but for the people of the whole world. Everyone's concern is, will Bangabandhu declare the independence of Bangladesh? No, he did not declare the independence of Bangladesh that day. However, Bangabandhu gave a timeless speech and direction to the nation on that day, which has secured a permanent place in the history of the Bengali nation. He said firmly, "This time's struggle is our liberation struggle, this time's struggle is freedom's struggle, when I have given blood, I will give more blood; I will free the people of this country, God willing." He could have directly declared independence on March 7 as expected by the Bengali nation. But he did not know that the path to freedom is very difficult and thorny. Therefore, he said, "Build a fort from house to house, you have to fight the enemy with whatever you have." As a result of his bold call on March 7, the non-cooperation movement intensified and the country became full of freedom slogans. An independent country can be found within a sovereign country. So Bangabandhu's speech of March 7 was a milestone of independence.Thousands of unarmed people would have died in the immediate attack. Gaining international sympathy and support for independence would have been a matter of time, independence would have been a distant defeat. So at that moment, the declaration of independence would have been arbitrary. In this regard, Bangabandhu showed political foresight by dealing with the situation with great wisdom. As a result, his March 7 speech has made the Bengali nation a seat of eternal glory.

Explanation of key terms:

Basic Democracy: General Ayub Khan, the military ruler of Pakistan, announced a novel electoral system called 'Basic Democracy' on 26 October 1959 to stay in power. The basic democracy mandate introduced four tiers of local autonomy. The four levels are – 1. Union Council, 2. Thana Council, 3. District Council, Divisional Council. In this election management, 40 thousand from East Pakistan and 40 thousand from West Pakistan, a total of 80 thousand members were elected from the union level and they elected the president, national and provincial council members.

Tashkent Agreement: On September 6, 1965, when Pakistani troops entered Indian-controlled Kashmir, full-scale war broke out between the two countries. After 17 days of war, an agreement was signed between the President of Pakistan Ayub Khan and the Prime Minister of India Lal Bahadur Shastri on January 10, 1966 in the city of Tashkent, the capital of Uzbekistan, under the mediation of the United Nations. which is known as the Tashkent Agreement.

Six-points: Six-points are known as Bengalis' Emancipation Charter. After the Indo-Pak War of 1965, Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman raised the historic 'six-point demand' at the Pakistan opposition party conference held in Lahore on February 5, 1966. But when the six-points were rejected by the opposition party in Pakistan, Bangabandhu returned to his homeland and highlighted the importance of his six-points to the Bengali nation. When Bengalis realized the importance of 6 points and started the movement, 11 people were killed in police firing on 7 June. This resulted in the six-point Bengali nation's Emancipation Charter or Magna Carta.

Agartala case: On January 18, 1968, the Ayub government filed a case against Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman and 35 people on charges of sedition.

In official documents, the case is titled "State vs. Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman and others." The prosecution's charge against the accused said that Sheikh Mujibur Rahman secretly met Congress leader (later Chief Minister) Sachindralal Singh in Tripura's capital Agartala. It was through this meeting that he sent a message to Indian Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru seeking help in the armed movement. That is why the case is called Agartala case

Bangabandhu: In 1969, when the eleven points of the Chhatra-Sangram Parishad were combined with the six-points, the momentum of the movement intensified. Unable to stand in front of this mass-oriented movement of the students, the autocratic Ayub government was forced to surrender to the masses and unconditionally released Sheikh Mujibur Rahman and other royal prisoners on February 22. After his release from prison, Sheikh Mujibur Rahman addressed a public gathering at the historic Race Course Maidan on 23 February. On behalf of Chhatra-Sangram Parishad, Daksu VP Tofail Ahmed awarded Sheikh Mujibur Rahman with the title of 'Bangabandhu' at the race course reception.

Chapter Six

Declaration of Independence and Liberation War of Bangladesh

Introduction:

Ever since the creation of Pakistan, the history of East Bengal has been very painful and eventful. Bengalis had to give their blood in 1952 to speak their mother tongue. Again, in the 1969 uprising, Bengalis had to shed fresh blood. However, the bloodshed of the Pakistani ruling group did not end. In 1971, Bangladesh Awami League won the majority of seats in the national and provincial councils in the general elections of Pakistan, but they could not sit in the parliament of Pakistan, even though they stained the streets of Bengal with blood. So the history of killing Bengalis by the rulers after the creation of Pakistan is not a new phenomenon. The history of Bengalis from 1952 to 1971 is the history of disappointment and deprivation. Bengalis had to do nine months of armed struggle and liberation war to remove this disappointment and deprivation in the national life.

Events after the National Election: In 1970, the first national election was held in Pakistan. Bangladesh Awami League achieved unprecedented majorities in national and provincial assemblies based on adult direct suffrage. After the election, the President of Pakistan General Yahya Khan congratulated Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman as the future Prime Minister of Pakistan. At the same time, President Yahya announced the session of the National Assembly for the transfer of power on March 3, 1971. But it is a matter of great regret that Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman could not sit in the parliament of Pakistan. One of the masterminds of this conspiracy was Pakistan Peoples Party leader Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto, Muslim League leader Khan Abdul Qayyum Khan, Western industrialists, bureaucrats and high-ranking army officers. On March 14, in a public meeting in Karachi, PPP chief Bhutto proposed the transfer of power to the two majority parties of East and West Pakistan, which was an attempt to create two Pakistans. On that day, Sheikh Mujibur Rahman, a legitimate claimant, was blamed for Bhutto's such proposal, not considering him a separatist. Then a nefarious plot was launched against him to defeat the just claim. On February 15, 1971, People's Party chief Bhutto announced that "the elected members of West Pakistan will not be allowed to attend the National Assembly session to be held in Dhaka. Even then, if the National Assembly session is held, it will turn into a slaughterhouse."

Pakistan President Yahya Khan was expecting such a conspiracy. He stunned the entire nation by announcing the indefinite suspension of the session of the National Assembly of Pakistan (March 3) on March 1, 1971. The people of East Bengal erupted in fierce protests as the National Assembly session was suspended without consulting the leader of the majority party, Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman. The short-sighted President of Pakistan thus axed the foundation of the state of Pakistan by announcing the adjournment of the session of the National Assembly on the bad advice of Mr. Bhutto. In view of such incidents, on March 15, 1971, Sheikh Mujibur Rahman issued 35 regulations to introduce civil administration.

Demand for independence by Maulana Bhasani: In a public meeting on March 9, Maulana Bhasani strongly urged the Pakistani ruling class to accept the independence of Bengal. Otherwise he reminded him of the fate of the British Empire. When Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman announced taking over the rule of Bengal on March 15, Yahya Khan came to Dhaka that afternoon to discuss with Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman and expressed his regret for the situation. Then other leaders of West Pakistan participated in the discussion.

Bangabandhu Mujib-Yahia-Bhutto talks: The Bhutto-Yahia cycle talks with Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman from March 15 to March 24, 1971 were just a farce wrapped in the conspiracy of the Pakistani military. Pakistan President Yahya Khan came to Dhaka on March 15 for talks. Mujib-Yahia talks started in Dhaka from March 16. Then Zulfikar Ali Bhutto and top political leaders of Pakistan joined the discussion. Apart from this discussion, the people's non-cooperation movement announced earlier by Awami League was going on in East Pakistan. East Pakistan's offices, courts, banks, insurance, factories, schools and colleges started operating according to the declared principles of non-cooperation movement. Disturbed by the turbulent political environment of East Bengal, foreigners have already started leaving Dhaka. Non-Bengali military and civilian officers and wealthy Pakistanis left East Pakistan with their wives and sons for West Pakistan.

Pakistan's President Jallad Yahya and conspiracy hero Zulfikar Ali Bhutto prolonged negotiations with Bangabandhu, allowing the SWAT ships to secretly deliver heavy weapons to the port of Chittagong to the Pakistani military. On the other hand, on March 17, General Tikka Khan, Lt. General Khadim Hossain and Rao Farman Ali gave approval for 'Operation Searchlight'.

When the journalists asked about the progress of the talks, they informed that the talks were satisfactory. Gradually, the people of East Bengal became frightened, bewildered and suspicious of the lapses of the Bhutto cycle and the clandestine activities and suspicious movements of the military. As a result, the political environment of East Bengal became more heated. In this situation, on 23 March 1971, on the Republic Day of Pakistan, the people of Bangladesh hoisted the Bangladesh flag from house to house instead of the national flag of Pakistan. As a result, the Yahya-Bhuttochakra talks ended in failure.

According to experts, the Mujib-Yahia talks were just a delay. As a result of Yahya Bhutto's delay in the name of negotiations, military equipment and weapons of the Pakistan Army quickly arrived in East Pakistan. Then the dictator Yahya and his supporter Zulfikar Ali Bhutto fled Dhaka in the dark of night before the end of the 25th March talks was announced. Formerly the military rulers of East Bengal led by the infamous Tikka Khan and Rao Farman Ali A blue plan called Operation Searchlight was formed to exterminate Bengalis. On the eve of leaving Dhaka on March 25, Yahya Khan ordered the army to carry out a hellish massacre in the whole of East Pakistan, including the capital Dhaka. After that, under the leadership of Tikka Khan and Rao Farman Ali, on the dark night of March 25, the hellish massacre of Yahya Khan's executioners started on the unarmed Bengali nation of East Pakistan. Bhutto left Dhaka on the morning of March 26 under armed military guard.

The context of the declaration of independence and the declaration of independence of Bangladesh: Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman declared the independence of Bangladesh in the first hour of March 26 (after 12 o'clock on March 25) just before he was arrested. That is why Bangladesh's Great Independence Day is celebrated on March 26. The declaration was in English, the world could understand the declaration. The Bengali translation of the Declaration of Independence is as follows:

"This may be my last message, Bangladesh is independent from today. I call upon the people of Bangladesh to stand up wherever they are, with whatever they have, to resist the invading forces with all their might. Pakistanis • Continue to fight until the last soldier of the occupying force is expelled from the soil of Bengal and the final victory is achieved.' Chittagong's Awami League leader Zahur Ahmed Chowdhury delivered Bangabandhu's message to Chittagong wireless department that night. Source: Hasan Hafizur Rahman Edited Bangladesh Independence War Papers: 3rd Volume People's Republic of Bangladesh Ministry of Information 1982 p. 21.(Bangladesh Gazette, Fifth Amendment to the Constitution dated 3 July 2011).

This declaration of independence message was quickly disseminated and delivered to various places in Bangladesh through transmitters, telegrams and teleprinters of the then EP-R. Then Awami League's then Chittagong president M.A. Hannan first broadcasted the declaration of independence on March 26 afternoon from Chittagong Betar and second broadcast from Kalurghat Betar Center in the evening. Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman's declaration of independence made the Bengali people very happy and emotional. The Bengali freedom-seeking population was energized by the support of the Bengali military, paramilitary and civilian forces and the participation of the general public towards the declaration of independence.

Massacre by Pakistan Army

Bangabandhu's pre-announced non-cooperation movement to thwart the Yahya-Bhuttochakra conspiracy ignited like a wildfire throughout East Bengal. On the night of March 25, without announcing the end of the negotiations, the President of Pakistan, Yahya Khan, ordered the army to kill the Bengalis and left Dhaka. After that, Operation Searchlight or hellish brutal killings were conducted according to the blue plan of Tikka Khan and Rao Farman Ali, the military rulers of East Bengal.

On the dark night of March 25, the most despicable barbaric massacre in history began in the whole of Bangladesh, including the capital Dhaka. At first, the Pakistani invasion forces with their violence and frenzy attacked the unarmed innocent people and common people of the metropolis of Dhaka. Their destructive activities started with arson and arson. After that, Dhaka University, the source of all the movements, became the first victim of their hellish murders. In the dead of night, the invading forces attacked the homes of the dedicated faculty and staff of the university and killed people indiscriminately. Even university student halls became victims of their brutal attacks. Jahurul Haque Hall, Jagannath Hall and Rokeya Hall of the university were victims of their brutal killings and brutal torture. Thousands of slum dwellers, including innocent men, women, laborers and children, were not spared from the ferocity of the attack by the Pakistani forces. The killing of 25th March was an unprecedented mass killing Genocide.

The main targets of the Pakistani invasion forces were the Rajarbagh Police Line and the EPR Camp (present BGB) in Pilkhana. The invading forces then attacked the headquarters of the EPR Force (now BGB) in Pilkhana. As a result of this attack, many members of the EPR forces who could not escape were brutally killed by the Pak forces. In this way, on the night of 25th March, Yahya's executioner's forces attacked 50,000 men and women mercilessly in Dhaka city alone. Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman was arrested on the night of March 25 after 12 o'clock. Before his arrest, Bangabandhu announced the independence of Bangladesh. Then he was transferred from East Pakistan to West Pakistan jail that night.

On the night of March 25, Pakistan's invading forces launched a massive operation in the entire Bangladesh including Dhaka. They attacked the unarmed masses of Bengal with modern weapons like tanks, cannons, machine guns. The worst murder in history began. The people in different neighborhoods of the capital city of Dhaka created barricades by throwing tree trunks on the road for their safety, but they could not escape from the violent attacks of the invading forces. In particular, the invading forces with the help of their accomplices, the Razakars, resorted to brutal torture and massacres in the Hindu slums. Nawabpur, Shakhari Bazar and Tanti Bazar in old Dhaka are prime examples of the capital.

Since the creation of Pakistan, Dhaka University has been called the cradle of the movement. Because since the creation of Pakistan, Dhaka University plays a leading role in almost all movements starting from the language movement. That is why the Pakistani forces chose Dhaka University as the main target of their attack. Hanadar Bahini University professor Dr. Govinda Chandra Dev, Dr. Muniruzzaman and Professor Dr. Jyotirmaya brutally kills Guha Thakurta. They killed thousands of students in the halls of Dhaka University. The ferocity and cruelest massacres of the Pakistani forces in Dhaka defeated even the barbaric Mongol and Nazi forces. The night of 25th March will turn into a terrible demonic night of Arabic novel Daityapuri for the people of Dhaka.

The next day, March 26, there was silence all around. Curfew has been imposed in the entire metropolis. Sometimes the sound of army vehicles is heard. It seems that the bodies of those who were killed by the invading forces during the night are being removed. In the sky of Dhaka, even crows and birds are not flying. Perhaps the smell and sound of nighttime ammunition drove them elsewhere. Sometimes the sound of cannon fire is heard from the direction of Kamalapur railway station. Only one thing is peeking in the frightened minds of the besieged Dhaka residents, where is Bangabandhu, the leader of their lives? Is he alive? The people of East Bengal came to know through the evening radio that Bangabandhu was imprisoned in Pakistan's jail through various worries and anxiety.

Resistance system of the Bengali people: The Bengali people with immense courage built a strong resistance system against the Pakistani invading forces. The Pakistani army had planned to liberate Bangladesh from Bengali control in just three days. But the brave Bengalis soon proved that the soil of Bengal was a stronghold. Unarmed, though at the cost of millions of lives, the Bengalis continued to struggle with a fierce oath to the death to save the country from the ferocity of the well-trained Pakistani invading forces. They created barricades at various places, destroyed railway lines, bridges and started facing obstacles to the Pakistani forces at every step.

Gradually, the Pakistani forces established their army camps in every district town, sub-division and police station throughout Bangladesh. At the same time, the forces of Albadar, Alshams and Razakar, the local allies of the Pak army, which were formed as their helpers, increased. Moreover, a peace committee is formed with the chairmen in each union. Fed up with their torture and torture, thousands of students, teachers, youth, workers, intellectuals and common people of this country crossed the border in groups and took refuge in India. The Indian government responded to the plight of Bangladesh by setting up thousands of refugee camps in the border areas. Millions of Bengalis took shelter in refugee camps and began receiving military training to resist the invading forces. The Mukti Pagal Janata of Bengal formed Muktijudho Sangram Parishad in each village to confront the Pak army and their allies Albadar, Alshams and Razakar forces in order to free the country from invaders. They provided shelter to the freedom fighters against the native Rajakars and Pak forces, supplied food and provided new information about the invaders. After that, by destroying the bridges and culverts on the way of the Pakistani forces, they created obstacles in their movement and created panic. On the basis of secret information, the ambush attacked the camp of the Pak army and caused them heavy losses. In this way, Mukti Bahini created barricades in different parts of the country, destroyed railway lines, bridges, culverts and faced obstacles at every step of the Pakistan Army.

Bengali leaders especially elected members of provincial and national councils of Awami League took refuge in India after watching the brutal killings, arson and inhumane torture by the Pakistani forces on the night of 25th March. Every day thousands of people left their own homes and sought refuge in India due to torture and torture by the Pakistani forces and their allies Al Badr, Al Shams and Razakar forces. As a result, the refugee camps in India became overcrowded with helpless people. In such a situation, the Bengali leaders had to approach the Government of India for their food, clothing and shelter. Besides, the leaders have to request the necessary help from various ministries of the Government of India to speed up the liberation war. Then on 10th April 1971, after the formation of Bangladesh government in exile and swearing-in ceremony of Ber Mujibnagar government, it became easier to conduct the liberation war of the independent Bangladesh government. Since then, the leaders of the independent Bangladesh government became particularly active in seeking moral support and recognition from foreign countries.

Expatriate Bangladesh government formation and swearing-in ceremony of Mujibnagar government

The glorious history of liberation war is the formation of independent Mujibnagar government. April 10, 1971 is a memorable day in the history of independent Bengal. On this day, in the presence of local and foreign journalists and distinguished guests, the plan to form the Mujibnagar government was accepted at Amrakanan, Baidyanath floor, Meherpur, Greater Kushtia district. Then on the same day on April 10, an order was issued to declare the Mujibnagar Government of the Independent People's Republic of Bangladesh. The structure of the expatriate or provisional Mujibnagar Government of the Independent People's Republic of Bangladesh was as follows—

"In accordance with the Declaration of Independence, the Government of the Independent People's Republic of Bangladesh/Mujibnagar Government in Exile was constituted. This government is known as the Mujibnagar Government. The structure was as follows:

Office	Office Holder	Notes
President	Sheikh Mujibur Rahman	Nominal president. Detained in West Pakistan throughout the war.

Then National Assembly member retired colonel MA. G. Osmani was appointed as the Chief of Armed Forces of independent Bangladesh. An advisory council consisting of 9 members was formed in September 1971 for the smooth running and guidance of the newly formed Mujibnagar government of independent Bangladesh. The members of the advisory board were Maulana Abdul Hamid Khan Bhasani (Bhasani NAP), Professor Mozaffar Ahmed (NAP Awami Party), Comrade Moni Singh of Communist Party, Shri Manoranjan Dhar of Congress and 5 representatives of Awami League. Besides, 4 more people were appointed on special duty. Namely- Professor Md. Yusuf Ali MNA in aid and rehabilitation, Mr. Abdul Mannan MNA in radio and broadcasting. Volunteer Core Barrister Amirul Islam MNA, Commerce Mr. Matiur Rahman MNA.

Asylum in India: Infernal killings and torture by the Pakistani occupation forces, Bengalis started crossing the border and taking refuge in India. Relatives of government employees, military and paramilitary personnel who participated in the liberation war on the side of Bengalis sought refuge in India due to persecution by the Pakistanis. Apart from this, the Government of India opened shelter camps in Tripura, Assam, Meghalaya, West Bengal for all the people of EPR Police Bengal Regiment who took refuge in India due to the fear of torture by the invading forces. Apart from this, every day the Bengalis continue to flock to the asylum camps in India due to the torture of the Pakistani army. About 1 crore destitute people took refuge on Indian soil. Millions of teenagers participated in the liberation war. The Indian government not only gave refuge to Bengalis but also did not hesitate to tell the story of oppression and oppression of Bengalis to the world. Today, the nation remembers with gratitude the contribution of the people of India in the liberation struggle of Bengal.

Formation of Mukti Bahini (Land, Navy and Air Force)

The importance of Mujibnagar government in the history of the liberation war of Bangladesh is immense. On the dark night of March 25, 1971, the Pakistani forces launched a surprise attack on the Pilkhana EPR headquarters, Rajarbagh Police Line and Dhaka University, and basically the armed liberation war started from then. On March 26, Bangabandhu's Declaration of Independence was broadcast from Chittagong Radio Station. After the formation of the Mujibnagar government on April 17, 1971, a liberation army was formed with military and civilian people to conduct the liberation war smoothly. As a result of the formation of the Mujibnagar government, it became possible to build a strong and agile liberation army (army). As a result, the resistance struggle of Mukti Bahini started.

Facing resistance, the Pakistani forces created terror in Bangladesh through massacres, looting, torture of women and arson. The Pakistani forces and their henchmen Razakars, Albadars, Alshams and other brokers burnt one village after another through arson. As a result of brutal torture and torture by Pak army and their henchmen, students, youth and general public took shelter in refugee camps in India. Later they joined the Mukti Bahini to liberate the motherland from the invaders. Along with the civil administration, the military sector was developed to conduct war in the free areas bordering Bangladesh. As a result, thousands of students and youths in the liberated areas were given the necessary military training.

Mukti Bahini training was initially started by Indian Army personnel to provide superior training to Bangladesh Mukti Bahini. Later, Bengali army officers, soldiers, EPR, police, navy and air force serving in Pakistan joined the Mujibnagar government. As a result, the strength of the Bangladesh Army increased. At that time, higher training measures were taken by Mukti Bahini by the senior officers of the military.

Sector management of liberation war

On April 17, the Mujibnagar government divided the whole of Bangladesh into 4 military zones to manage the liberation war smoothly. On April 11, the government divided the newly formed Bangladesh Army into 11 sectors and assigned the responsibility of conducting the war. Thus the entire Bangladesh is divided into 11 sectors and the responsibility of each sector is entrusted to a sector commander. The freedom fighters under the leadership of Major Ziaur Rahman, Major Shafiullah, Major Taher, Major Jalil, Major Khaled Musharraf under the leadership of Colonel (retd) Osmani of Mujibnagar government continued to attack the invaders in guerilla style. The role of guerilla forces was one of the fighting forces of Bangladesh government. Overwhelmed by the attack of the guerrilla forces of Bangladesh, the Pakistani forces redoubled their barbaric violence against the innocent people and became intoxicated to burn and destroy the entire Bangladesh. As a result, about one crore helpless oppressed people of Bangladesh took refuge in Indian soil.

Sector Command in Liberation War

With the formation of the Mujibnagar government, oppressed students, youth and ordinary citizens of Bengal saw a ray of hope. They went to the Mujibnagar government training centers in Bengal and bordered India to join the groups. Later these freedom fighters were given appropriate training by Indian Army and Bangladesh Army officials. Under the leadership of Prime Minister Tajuddin Ahmed of the Mujibnagar government, the newly formed Bangladesh Army was divided into 11 sectors and ordered to conduct the war. The role of guerrilla forces was one of them.

K. The Force displayed valor in the battles of Belonia, Mandavag, Shalda and Kasbar. To fight in these newly formed forces, the freedom fighters were trained in the border areas with the help of the Indian Army. Moreover, thousands are particularly memorable. Freedom fighters are sent for operations inside the country with guerilla training. The contribution of guerrilla forces in the war of liberation

Air Force: The Government of Bangladesh appointed Air Force Group Captain AK Khandkar as the Deputy Chief of Staff of the Liberation Army. He formed the Bangladesh Air Force on 28 September 1971 on the instructions of the government in exile. Bangladesh Air Force started its journey with 18 pilots and 70 airmen. Bangladesh Army Deputy Chief of Staff and Air Force Group Chief Captain AK Khandkar brought together all Air Force pilots and technicians who participated in the ground war to form an 'Air Force' unit. It was provided by the Bangladesh government as there was no aircraft. The Indian Air Force has delivered one Otter, one All-Weight helicopter and one DC-3 Dakota aircraft to the Government of Bangladesh.

On September 28, a gathering at the Dimapur airport in Nagaland decided to launch an air attack on the Pakistani forces. It was decided to fly the planes below 300 feet above the ground so as not to be detected on radar screens. .

At 2 am in December, Bangladeshi aircraft returned safely after carrying out airstrikes on oil dumps near Chittagong Port and Godnail near Narayanganj. The Bangladesh Air Force conducted 45 major operations targeting Pakistan Army positions at the end of the Liberation War. 126 ships of the Pakistan Navy were sunk by aerial bombardment and paralysed the port of Chittagong.

Bangladesh Navy: In March 1971, under Pakistan Navy, after training in France's Tulo Naughati, 8 allied submarine naval forces including Md. Rahmat Ullah C-PO, Md. Badiul Alam ME-1 escaped and joined the liberation war of Bangladesh.

A training center was set up at Palashi in Murshidabad to train Bangladesh Naval Commandos. On May 21, 120 youths were recruited in the first batch and 200 youths in the second batch for training. Md. Rahmat Ullah C-PO took care of them during the training. After completing their training on 31 July, plans were made to attack major sea and seaports and sink Pakistani and foreign ships. For this purpose, 178 trained commandos were divided into four groups and sent to destroy Chittagong, Chandpur, Narayanganj and Mongla ports. This daring naval commando crossed the Indian border and reached the destination with great difficulty avoiding the eyes of the Punjabi army, Razakars and local brokers. Then they successfully conducted the attack. On August 16, Bangladeshi naval commandos from Swadhin Bangla Betar Kendra and BBC attacked 6 ships and barges in Chittagong seaport, 1 ship (Gazi) and 1 pontoon in Chandpur. 5 ships and barges at Mongla port, 3 coasters and barges at Narayanganj port and Daudkandi bridge completely destroyed. Many of the trained naval commandos continued operations in the sea and naval ports in the greater Khulna area with short-term training of about eight thousand teenagers in the Sundarbans area. The Pakistani invasion forces were disoriented by the three-pronged attack by land, air and Bangladesh Navy forces. On the other hand, they were afraid to go outside the army camp even during the day due to the fear of Bangladesh guerrilla forces.

Zonal Council: The Zonal Council was formed to review the progress, success, failure or the advantages and disadvantages of the officers in conducting the war and what would be the next course of action to deal with the war preparations of the adversary. The head of which was Army Chief MAG Osmani and the sector commanders were all members of this council. After getting a proper understanding of the war preparations of Dosar Al Shams, Al Badr and Razakars of the Pakistani forces, a definite decision was taken through the Zonal Council that a frontal war or guerilla method would be adopted to prevent it. Moreover, what will be the next battle tactics and what kind of weapons to be supplied to counter the attack of the aggressors is decided by the zonal council. The zonal councils play an important role in the liberation war by taking necessary measures to increase the strength of the freedom fighters and providing them with timely weapons.

War Management Matters: The Mujibnagar government divided the entire Bangladesh into 11 sectors to wage the war of liberation. Then the Pakistani forces adopted a strong battle plan expressing their determination to resist. Again, he is conscious and active in keeping the morale of the people of the country intact during the war. Maintaining the internal stability of the country and maintaining the morale of the people is one of the responsibilities of every party during the state of emergency or war. The Mujibnagar government was able to perform all duties with great vigilance and efficiency during the liberation war.

All-Party Advisory Committee: It is not possible to complete any big task single-handedly. That is why Bangladesh Awami League realizes the need to form a national coordination committee based on consensus for the smooth conduct of the liberation war. Awami League leaders felt the urge to form an all-party advisory council for the smooth conduct of the liberation war along with the formation of the Mujibnagar government of independent Bangladesh. An advisory committee of 9 members was formed under the leadership of Prime Minister Tajuddin in the first week of September. To give advice and counsel to the Mujibnagar government, an advisory council consisting of Maulana Abdul Hamid Khan Bhasani of the National Awami Party (Bhasani), Prof. Mozaffar Ahmed of the National Awami Party, Comrade Monisingh of the Communist Party, Shri Manoranjandhar of the Congress and 4 representatives of the Congress and 5 members of the Awami League has been formed. is done The newly formed advisory council plays an active role in speeding up the activities of the independent Mujibnagar government by providing necessary advice and suggestions in all areas.

Moreover, 4 elected representatives of the legislature are given special responsibilities; Namely - Information, Radio and Broadcasting: Abdul Mannan M.N.A. Aid and Rehabilitation -Professor Yusuf Ali - M.N.A. Volunteer Core – Barrister Amirul Islam M.N.A, Commercial Affairs – Matiur Rahman M.N. At

From Guerrilla to Frontline War: Bengali students and youths quickly entered the forests, villages and cities of Bengal after learning the necessary tactics to attack the enemy. Taking a vow of death to avenge the honor of their mothers and sisters and to avenge the killing of innocent people, they started attacking the invading forces. They destroyed the roads, bridges, culverts of Bengal, creating obstacles for the invading Pakistani forces and taking the opportunity to attack them and faced heavy losses. The well-armed Pakistani invasion force was finally demoralized by the Mukti Bahini guerilla attacks. 237 officers of the Dhaka Pak-invader forces killed 136 JCOs and 3,559 soldiers of other ranks before the joint force operation began. In the face of the initial resistance of the Mukti Bahini, the Pakistani soldiers did not dare to go outside the military base even during the day. Thus, Mukti Bahini established its headquarters in Tetulia and continued its guerilla attacks in the areas of Rangpur, Bogra, Sirajganj, Jamalpur etc.

The Mujibnagar government, hoping for the success of the daily freedom fighters, decided to launch an all-out war. For this purpose the entire Bangladesh is divided into 11 sectors and the responsibility of each sector is entrusted to a sector commander. The role of the Mujibnagar government's guerrilla forces in each sector was unique. Guerrilla forces were always active in conducting guerilla attacks along with regular army personnel in every sector of Bangladesh.

Guerrillas, freedom fighters were well known as Mukti Fauj to the people of Bangladesh. In this Muktifouz or Mukti Bahini, young and old, workers, students, teachers, youth, women, men, farmers, workers, political party workers and people of various professions participated in groups. When the Mukti Bahini intensified guerrilla activities in the capital city of Dhaka to free Bangladesh from invaders, the Pak Bahini became scared and alarmed. On the other hand, in order to demoralize Bangladesh, the Pakistani invaders killed teachers, professors, teachers, professors,get up On the other hand, the guerilla forces intensified their guerilla attacks to kill the Pak invaders and their accomplices Razakar, Al-Shams, Al-Badar and Dalal. In this way, the fighters of the guerilla forces risked their lives and killed Ayub Khan's accomplice, former governor Monayem Khan, at his residence in the capital city of Dhaka. Such an unprecedented campaign by the guerrilla forces helped create a favorable public opinion of the people of Bengal and even the Bengalis outside the world towards the victory of the freedom fighters. Gradually, the freedom fighters occupied the border areas of Bangladesh and established civil administration in the liberated areas.

Operation of the Joint Forces: The operation of the joint forces is an unforgettable event in the history of the independence war of Bangladesh. From the month of November 1971, Mukti Bahini broke the bridges and culverts and severely cornered the Pakistani forces by creating obstacles to their movement. In this situation, the government of Pakistan instead of Dr. Tikkakhan. Abdul Malek was appointed governor of East Pakistan and tried to normalize the situation by forming a civilian cabinet. Despite this, the Pakistani forces and their local agents continued to face strong resistance from the Mukti Bahini and the local people. Desperate, the rajakars and brokers left the village and hid in the city. As a result, the vast rural areas of Bangladesh came under the control of Mukti Bahini one after another.

As the strength of Mukti Bahini increased, they gradually started attacking the Pakistani forces in big cities like Dhaka, Rajshahi, Narayanganj and Khulna. Towards the end of November they liberated vast areas of Dinajpur, Kushtia, Khulna, Jessore and broke the morale of the invading forces. In this situation, the dictatorial government of Pakistan, without seeing the change, suddenly launched air strikes on Amritsar, Jodhpur, Pathankort and Agra in India and indulged in a nefarious conspiracy to turn the liberation war into a Pak-India war. As a result, India was forced to declare war on Pakistan on December 4, 1971.

Then the President of Pakistan Yahya Khan tried hard to stop the liberation war by the United States of America through the United Nations. Nixon was the president of the United States at that time. He presented a resolution to the Security Council threatening to send the Seventh Fleet to demand a cessation of hostilities. But the attempt failed due to the application of 'veto' by the Soviet Union (now Russia). After reviewing the situation, India recognized Bangladesh as an independent sovereign state on December 6. .

After the recognition of India, Bangladesh Liberation Army and Indian Army formed Joint Command Council or Joint Command. Then the Eastern Command of the Joint Forces was appointed Lt. General Jagjit Singh Arora. On December 14, the joint forces attacked by water, land and air, and the Pakistani forces became disorientated and indulged in massacres. The invading forces killed the meritorious children of Bangladesh in a well-planned manner by their associates Jamaat-e-Islami Tabedar Razakar, Al-Badr, Al-Shams. Many people lost their lives due to their endless torture. The honor of mothers and sisters is lost. teacher, became even more furious.

They became active in killing the pimps of the Pakistani forces and the Guerrilla fighters of Dhaka killed Ayub Khan's notorious pimp, former governor Monayem Khan, at his residence. As a result, the Pak forces were greatly weakened by the guerilla forces in water, land and space and started fleeing in disorientation due to the heavy attack and airstrikes of the joint forces. In just 13 days of war, Pakistan forces faced destruction and started looking for a way to defend themselves. At that time, when General Arora, the Eastern Command of the joint forces, called upon the Pakistani forces to surrender, they agreed.

Propaganda of Liberation War: Media is the biggest weapon for any country or nation and is very important in shaping public opinion. That is why it was the moral responsibility and duty of the government to set up a wireless center of independent Bengal along with the formation of the Mujibnagar government of independent Bangladesh. It became imperative for the independent Mujibnagar government to set up a radio station to spread the story of atrocities, oppression and torture of its allies by the Pakistani forces in Bangladesh to the country and the outside world. Only by means of wireless devices can the advance of the loyalist forces of the Government and the position of the adversary be made known to the public in time of war.

Swadhin Bangla Betar Kendra: Swadhin Bangla Betar Center was shifted from Chittagong to Mujibnagar in Meherpur with the declaration of Mujibnagar Government of Swadhin Bengal. Swadhin Bengal's radio center may have been shifted to Mujibnagar. People of Bangladesh are regularly informed about the national anthem of Bangladesh, news bulletins and daily activities of the government

Even after the killings and cruel tortures of the invading forces and the Razakars, the people are eager to listen to the news of independent Bengal's wireless center every evening. Deshabasi Swadhin Bangla's Betar Kendra news, liberation war based patriotic songs, poetry readings and MR Akhtar Mukul's very popular 'Charampatra' program and 'Jallader Darbar' greatly encouraged and motivated the freedom crazed countrymen and freedom fighters. Moreover, Mukti Bahini's success on the battlefield was influenced by the assassination of President Ayub Khan's notorious ex-governor Monayem Khan at his residence by guerrilla forces. The incident is of great pride to the whole Bengali nation and is great in creating world opinion by increasing the glory of the Liberation Army at home and abroad.

Bengali women, government employees, military and paramilitary personnel and millions of youth took refuge in refugee camps in India due to the brutal killings and torture by the Pakistani forces. The Indian government was not satisfied with sheltering the Bengalis but did not hesitate to tell the story of the oppression of Bengalis to the world through Indian media. At the same time, Swadhin Bangla Betar Kendra broadcasted regular news bulletins on the hellish destructive activities of the invaders to create world opinion.

Newspapers

The importance of newspapers and magazines as media is immense. Any event can be sent from one end of the world to the other through newspapers. In addition to the national media, the world can know the story of about 1 crore refugees taking shelter in Indian refugee camps about the killing of Bengalis by the Pakistani invaders through newspapers. During the liberation war, the newspapers of different countries of the world such as India, United Kingdom, United States and Soviet Union, Nepal, Bhutan were very vocal. India's Jatiya Anandabazar Patrika and other newspapers were vocal in regular campaigns against the killing of Bengalis by the Pakistani invaders.

When the Bengali massacre was reported in the British press, several members of Parliament and Congressmen came forward to help the girls. Bangladesh news was read regularly from BBC London and British newspapers carried daily news.

Diplomatic Activities of Mujibnagar Government: Administrative officers are appointed to conduct the administrative activities of independent Mujibnagar Government and Ministries. At the same time, along with conducting the official activities of various ministries or departments, the government is specially responsible for the implementation of the Declaration of Independence and the coordination and recognition of foreign states.Action has to be taken.

Government of Bangladesh established diplomatic relations of independent Bangladesh with the outside world by establishing Bangladesh mission offices in major cities of the world such as Kolkata, Delhi, New York, Washington and London. The Mujibnagar government sent the then vice-chancellor of Dhaka University, Justice Abu Saeed Chowdhury, to different countries of the world as a special envoy to create world public opinion in favor of the liberation war and to gain the support of foreign countries. Justice Abu Saeed Chowdhury served as the Permanent Representative of the Bangladesh Mission in London during the Liberation War. At that time, he successfully presented the tragic story of the hellish massacre of the Pakistani forces in Dhaka University and the story of torture to the world community. As a result of his tireless efforts, Britain, Australia, West Germany, France, Italy, Japan and Canada supported and recognized Bangladesh's liberation war. However, during the war of liberation, some countries such as the United States and the People's Republic of China opposed the independent government of Bangladesh.

Anti-independence activities in the liberation war

The scandalous chapter of the liberation war in Bangladesh is the ineffectiveness of the Razaka forces and their opposition to the freedom fighters. In June 1971, Lt. General Tikka Khan issued the Razakar Ordinance in East Pakistan and formed the infamous Razakar Bahini. Initially, this force was formed with Ansar and Mujahideen, but many Pakistanis joined this force and were working as helpers or allies of the Pakistani forces. General Niazi's role in forming this force was very important. Razakars were given only one week of training. Their trainers were soldiers of Pakistan Army. Their training was limited to loading the gun and shooting. These Rajakars opposed the freedom fighters as allies of the occupying forces. Moreover, a formidable force called Albadar was formed with the members of Islami Chhatra Sangh, the student organization of Jamaat-e-Islami. Al Shams Bahini was also formed with the leaders and activists of other Islamic student organizations - who took responsibility for the killing of Bengali intellectuals. The head of the Al-Badr army was the current Amir of Jamaat-e-Islami, Matiur Rahman Nizami.

The first anti-liberation war organization that was born in opposition to the liberation war was the Peace Committee. This peace committee was formed as a subsidiary organization of the Pakistani forces in Dhaka and the whole of Bangladesh.

With the patronage of East Pakistan Governor General Tikka Khan and the participation and cooperation of various groups such as Jamaat-e-Islami, Council Muslim League, Ulamae Islam etc., this peace committee spread in Bangladesh.

They provided support to the occupying forces by organizing the most heinous crimes like torture, extortion, rape and genocide. Dhaka City Council Muslim League president Khawaja Khairuddin convened the Dhaka District Civil Peace Committee and the other members of this committee were Jamaat-e-Islam Ameer Ghulam Azam, Maulvi Farid Ahmad and S.M. Solomon and others. They were always active against the liberation war

Surrender of Pak army and emergence of independent sovereign Bangladesh

On December 6, 1971, Indian Prime Minister Indira Gandhi recognized Bangladesh as an independent sovereign Bangladesh. After the recognition of India, Bangladesh Liberation Army and Indian Army formed a joint army. The eastern commander of the joint forces was appointed Lt. General Jagjit Singh Arora. After that, due to the heavy attack of the combined forces by water, land and air, the Pakistani forces started to flee in disorientation. In just 13 days of war, Pakistan Army faced destruction and looked for a way to defend itself. At that time, when General Arora, the commander of the eastern region of the joint forces, called on the Pakistani forces to surrender, they quickly agreed.

Then on December 16, 1971 at 4 pm at Dhaka's Race Course Maidan, the Eastern Commander of the Pakistan Army, Lt. J. Niazi commander of the joint forces with about 93 thousand soldiers. J. Jagjit Singh surrendered to Arora. Thus, the surrender document was signed by General Niazi, the head of the two forces, and General Jagjit Singh, the head of the joint forces, one of the heroes of the liberation war, Quader Siddiqui Arora. Deputy Chief of Staff Group Captain A.K. was present on behalf of the Liberation Army. Khandkar and

In this way, after 9 months of cruel oppression and destruction by the Pakistani forces, the independent sovereign state of Bangladesh came into being in exchange for an ocean of blood. In exchange for the blood of about three million martyrs, the red and green flag of Bangladesh took place on the world map. Then the Mujibnagar government returned to Dhaka and assumed power on December 22, 1971.

Chapter Eight

Expatriate Bengalis and the outside world in the War of Liberation

Introduction:

Bangladesh is located in the south-eastern part of the Indian subcontinent. To its east lies Tripura, Meghalaya and India. And to the west lies West Bengal of India. To its south is the Bay of Bengal and to its north lies the Indian state of Cooch Behar. India is the only nearest neighbor of Bangladesh due to its location on India's lap. India's responsibilities and duties as Changladesh's nearest neighbor are high due to the related reasons. Just as India cannot remain silent on the natural world or any other crisis in Bangladesh, it could not remain silent during the great crisis of Bangladesh's independence war. On the night of March 25, 1971, when the murderous Pakistani forces ambushed the Pilkhana EPR headquarters, Rajarbagh Police Line and Dhaka University, the hellish killings were carried out. The armed liberation war of Bangladesh started from then.

Indian government, people and media in the liberation war of Bangladesh

The world woke up to the looting, rape of women, arson and massacres by the Pakistani invasion forces and their local allies Razakar, Al Badr and Al Shams. Various countries of the world, including neighboring India, strongly condemned and protested the shameless killing of Bengalis by the invading forces, and peacefully handed over power to the Pakistani government, leaving the country and taking refuge in India. At this time, the common people of India called forward to help the exiled Bengalis. Despite this, millions of Padhyams played an active role in the persecution, oppression and torture of the Pakistani forces and their allies. They played a strong role in spreading the news of Bengali killings by Pak forces on a daily basis. As a result, thousands of refugee camps were set up in the border areas of India. Not only that, newspapers of India also observe propaganda. When the news of the killing and torture of Bengali women by the Pakistani forces in Bangladesh was spread quickly in the Indian media, the world public opinion became vocal.

Most of the refugees took refuge in the border areas of West Bengal and Tripura. Government of India opened asylum camps for them on humanitarian grounds. But there are many types of complex problems including lack of food, clothing, shelter, medicine. Various types of complex diseases including cholera have become epidemic. Indian Prime Minister Indira Gandhi met with the Chief Ministers of 5 states and called it India's national problem and on May 18, in a public meeting, she highlighted the severity of the refugee problem and sought the cooperation of the world's most powerful countries for its immediate solution. After that, he visited different countries of the world from October 24 to garner support for the independence of Bangladesh.

The Indian government was disoriented by the pressure of Bengali refugees and raised the demand to stop the torture activities of the Pakistani invading forces in the United Nations. But as Pakistan is a friend of the United States and China, the Indian government was shocked by the negative role of the United Nations. Not getting the expected response from the United Nations to stop the torture of the Pakistani forces in Bangladesh, India brought to the attention of the world the horrific events of the Pakistani forces' murder, rape of women, looting, looting and arson. Not only that, the then Prime Minister of India Indira Gandhi set a burning example in the history of humanity by providing food, clothing, medical care and shelter to about one crore Bengali refugees. After that, he became active in creating world opinion by supporting the liberation war of Bengalis.

The Soviet Union, United Kingdom, France, Cuba, Yugoslavia, Poland, Czechoslovakia, East Germany provided moral support to Bangladesh despite the United States and the People's Republic of China opposing the Bengali liberation war. As a result, the liberation struggle of Bengalis was able to gain the moral support of the conscious cultural community, poets, writers, intellectuals and members of the Parliament of the United States and the United Kingdom. India recognized Bangladesh as an independent state on December 6, 1971 without delay. The next day on December 7, Bhutan recognized Bangladesh as an independent sovereign country.

Great forces in the war of liberation

Soviet Union: In 1971, the contribution of the Soviet Union will be forever remembered after India among the big powers in the history of the liberation war of Bangladesh. The Soviet Union (now Russia) played a glorious role in Bangladesh's independence war. When the Pakistani forces started the hellish killings, arson and torture of women in Bangladesh, the Soviet head of state Yahya Khan demanded to stop it and called for the transfer of power to the elected representatives. Despite this, the Pakistani forces continue to indiscriminately carry out mass killings in Bangladesh. In the meantime, when the Pakistani forces and brokers were disoriented by the joint command council consisting of the liberation forces and the Indian forces, Pakistan's president Yahya Khan tried to stop the war through the United Nations. In this regard, when the United States of America threatened to send the seventh fleet, the Soviet Union failed by applying a "veto".

Soviet newspapers and media also played an important role in the Soviet government. Newspapers played an instrumental role in creating world opinion in favor of Bangladesh's liberation war by publishing stories of shameless atrocities by Pakistan forces. As a result, socialist countries such as Cuba, Poland, Hungary, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, East Germany, etc., led by the then Soviet Union, sincerely supported Bangladesh. The Soviet Union recognized Bangladesh as an independent state on February 26, 1972.

United States of America

Expatriate Bengalis and the outside world in the War of Liberation

The United States is one of the world's 5 largest powers. Before the liberation war of Bangladesh in 1971. The powerful state was Pakistan's friend-state. Perhaps the country called Pakistan was carrying out indiscriminate genocide in Bangladesh with the support of this great power. After the war of independence started in Bangladesh in 1971, the countries of the world strongly protested and condemned the inhumane activities of the Pakistani occupation forces and their accomplices Al-Badr, Al-Shams and Razakars. The United Nations and the United States, established as the peacekeepers of the world, still play a silent role. The UN played a silent role when the Indian government drew the attention of the United Nations to deal with the crisis of food, clothing, shelter, health and medical care under the increasing pressure of nearly 1 crore refugees. A joint command has already been formed by Mukti Bahini and Indian forces. When the Pakistani forces were disoriented by the attack of the joint forces, the President of Pakistan requested the help of the United Nations and the United States of America to stop the war. Immediately, the United States pressured India to cease hostilities through the United Nations. When the United States proposed sending the Seventh Fleet to the United Nations, the Soviet Union vetoed it. Therefore, it can be said without a doubt that the role of the United States towards the Bengalis during the liberation war was negative. At that time Nixon administration took the side of Pakistan but the US people, legislature, congress and senate members, newspapers, artists, writers, intellectuals, politicians gave help and support to Bangladesh in various ways. Finally, under public pressure, the Nixon administration recognized Bangladesh on April 4, 1972.

Republic of China

The People's Republic of China was one of the five powerful nations of the United Nations in establishing world peace. People's Republic of China was Pakistan's friend against India. East Pakistan was only a province of Pakistan at that time. The government of Pakistan chose the path of conflict rather than handing over power peacefully to elected representatives. Despite knowing all the previous events, the People's Republic of China played a negative role without exerting any pressure on Pakistan regarding the transfer of power to the elected representative of East Pakistan, Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman.

The Chinese government did not make any protest when the Pakistani forces started indiscriminate killings, arson and torture of women in Bangladesh on the night of March 25, faking talks with Bangabandhu. Although the Chinese people and newspapers are vocal in protesting the killings, looting, arson and torture of women by the Pakistani forces in Bangladesh, the government plays a silent role.

After many sacrifices, when Bangladesh applied for membership in the United Nations after gaining independence, the People's Republic of China applied 'veto' and canceled it. The United States of America played a negative role against Bangladesh in the war of independence and recognized the independent Bangladesh on April 4 after independence. Although Bhutan is a small country bordering China, it sympathizes with the plight of Bengalis. However, the People's Republic of China agreed to recognize independent Bangladesh on 31 August 1975.

Britain

The contribution of the United Kingdom in the history of Bangladesh's independence war in 1971 is undeniable. From the beginning of the Liberation War, the people and the media of the United Kingdom played a strong role in favor of the Bengalis. Since the beginning of the war, the stories of brazen and barbaric attacks, killings and torture of women by the Pakistani forces have been widely disseminated through newspapers and magazines. Not only that, the story of the massacre by the Pakistani forces in Bangladesh, the tragic situation of nearly 10 million refugees sheltered in India, the BBC informed the world. At the same time, the Mukti Bahini's resistance against the Pakistani forces, the killing of President Ayub Khan's infamous Governor Monayem Khan by guerrilla forces in his residence in the capital city of Dhaka and the success of the guerrillas played an instrumental role in creating global public opinion in favor of the Bengali liberation war when broadcast on the BBC.

As the British government was sympathetic to the oppressed people of Bengal, BBC London was the main media for Bangladesh in the outside world. Moreover, the contribution of London's famous music artist Judge Harrison was unforgettable for Bangladesh. He organized a wonderful concert in the presence of about 40,000 people in New York City in the United States to create global public opinion in support of the liberation war and conduct donation support programs. In this music program, he made the world humanity aware of the Bengalis by performing the anti-human activities of the Pakistani forces through music. As a result, the media of other countries of the world, such as West Germany, Australia, France, Italy, Japan and Canada, play a helpful role in creating world opinion in favor of Bangladesh. Iraq and the people of Iraq supported Bangladesh in the war of liberation. United Kingdom recognized Bangladesh as an independent state on February 4, 1972.

 Liberation war and other countries: Before 1971, Bangladesh was a province of Pakistan known as East Pakistan. Before the liberation war, people of the world did not know any country called Bangladesh. But in 1971, when Bangladesh became a victim of brutal genocide, torture and torture by the Pakistani forces, about 1 crore Bengalis left the country and took shelter in refugee camps bordering India. At that time, the brutal murders, rape and torture of women in Bangladesh attracted the attention of the outside world through Indian newspapers and radio and television. At that time, BBC (London), one of the world's media outlets, and UK newspapers consistently presented the tragic story of torture by the Pakistani forces in Bangladesh to the world public.

When the sad story of the torture of the Pakistani army and its accomplices, the Razakars, became public, the world public became vocal in protesting the hellish killings and torture of Pakistan in Bangladesh. As a result, countries like Canada, France, Japan, West Germany, Australia strongly condemned the genocide and violence against women and called for the transfer of power to elected representatives. Foreign states used to review the situation beforehand. Finally supported the liberation war of Bangladesh and recognized it as an independent state.

The United Nations was born in 1945 after the failure of the League of Nations to establish world peace. How far the United Nations has succeeded in establishing world peace is debatable. Currently, Bangladesh is playing an important role in establishing peace and order in different countries of the world as a member state of the United Nations. But the United Nations, despite being the guardian of world peace and anti-humanitarian activities, played the role of a silent spectator against the indiscriminate massacres and torture of women by the Pakistani occupation forces during the Bangladesh Liberation War. The United Nations still kept silent when the friendly countries of India, which were plagued by the crowd of about 1 crore refugees, said. Countries like Russia, Poland and other countries have appealed to the United Nations to stop the massacre of Pakistani forces in Bangladesh and establish peace

Peace-loving people of the world are disappointed to see the silence of the United Nations on the barbaric attack, oppression and torture of the Pakistani forces in Bangladesh. Forced by the pressure of increasing refugees, India took the decision to conduct the war by forming a joint command council consisting of the Mukti Bahini and the Indian forces on the side of Bangladesh. At such a juncture, Pakistan declared war against India. When the Pakistani forces began to flee from the joint attack of the Mukti Bahini and the Indian forces, the President of Pakistan Yahya Khan tried to stop the war through the United Nations through the Security Council. At one point, the United States threatened to send the Seventh Fleet to the Security Council to demand an end to the war. But as the Soviet Union vetoed the proposal, the Security Council proposal was rejected.

Then, after nine months of a bloody war against the Pakistani forces, Bangladesh was born as an independent sovereign state in exchange for the blood of about 30 lakh martyrs. India recognized Bangladesh as an independent state on 6 December. When Bangladesh applied for UN membership after independence, China, Pakistan's friend, vetoed it. Then in 1974, Bangladesh became a member of the United Nations.

United Nations and other organizations: Due to the non-aligned foreign policy in independent Bangladesh, the friendship and sympathy of the member countries of the United Nations was easily achieved. As a result, it became a member of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) in 1972, a member of the International Labor Organization (ILO) on 22 June and a member of UNESCO on 19 October. Gradually, Bangladesh is occupying a seat of dignity in the international arena by showing constructive activity and responsibility. As a result of increasing status of Bangladesh in the international arena, Bangladesh became a member of WHO in 1997 and was elected to membership of several other organizations. Bangladesh was elected as a non-aligned member of the Security Council for two years in 1979-1980, defeating Japan for its non-aligned foreign policy and success in maintaining peace and order in the international arena. United Nations Secretary General Perez da Cuellar's visit to Bangladesh in 1989 boosted the image of Bangladesh in international circles.

Expatriate Bengalis and foreign individuals during the Liberation War
